PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 1, 1919.

THOMAS R. MARSHALL, of Indiana, Vice President of the United States, called the Senate to order at 12 o'clock meridian.

Rev. Ulysses Grant Warren, D. D., of Syracuse, N. Y., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, again we have assembled in the councils of our Nation for the purpose of carrying forward its mighty program in the affairs of mankind. We pray that Thou wilt guide us with the wisdom with which Thou hast always presided over the affairs of Thy children. Bless us with the integrity of Abraham, the wisdom of Solomon, the spirit of the Master, as we approach these great problems in this age of reconstruction. May we be guided by the divine light from on high, and may the principles of social justice, political freedom, and universal brotherhood be the trinity of worship on the altar of which these Members may pay homage to Him who is King of Kings and Lord of Lords. We pray Thee to bless the Chief Executive of this Nation and every man and woman unto whose hands has been committed an office of trust in a representative form of government. Guide us and save us finally through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT. NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 235), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to notify the President of the United States that a quorum of each House is assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. LODGE and Mr. HITCHCOCK as the committee on the part of the Senate.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 236), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 237), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock meridian until otherwise ordered.

RAILROAD CONTROL—ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, pending the report of the committee appointed to notify the President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts withhold the motion for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I had supposed that in accordance with the long-established custom the Senate would adjourn until a response could be received from the President of the United States. I desire to give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the close of the morning business, I shall move to take up for consideration the railroad bill, and I hope that the Senate will see its way clear to give its undivided consideration to that measure until we shall have concluded it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not think there is anything but precedent, which sometimes is "better honored in the breach than in the observance," to justify an adjournment until to-morrow. The present session of the Senate has an enormous docket before it. Every day should count, every day must count, if we are to transact any considerable percentage of the business confronting us. Personally, therefore, I protest against the proposed adjournment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under the circumstances I do not want to do anything that could be possibly construed as disrespectful to the President, and it is only because I felt that a disregard of a custom of many years might be construed as disrespect to the President that I said what I have.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the railroad bill is now the unfinished business, and therefore there could be no disrespect to the President if we went on with the unfinished business. I hope the Senate will remain in session for that purpose.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to add, Mr. President, if I may, that inasmuch as we have had a long extra session of Congress, while this is the first regular session, it does not find us in the position which the Senate would occupy if there had been no such extra session. I think if there had been no extra session it would be perfectly proper—perhaps the proprieties would require—that we should adjourn until we heard from the President. Under the present circumstances I do not see that any disrespect or discourtesy is involved in our proceeding to the discharge of the business that is before us. We are sent here to transact business. We have transacted very little of it since last May. If the present session is to be drawn out in the same way we shall perhaps adjourn some time next September with very little behind us to show for our work.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I wish to say, in addition to what I have already said, that I am quite ready to go on at this or any other moment at which the Senate will be willing to take up the bill; and if the Senate feels that it should not adjourn until a later hour in the afternoon, it will be entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. LODGE. I made the motion to adjourn in accordance with, I think, the unbroken custom to take a recess or adjourn on the first day of the session until the committee appointed to notify the President that Congress was ready to do business and receive any communication he might be pleased to make had performed its duty. The House, of course, joins with us in that action. The President is ill. I should be extremely sorry, personally, if anything were done which could be construed into any disrespect to him. For that reason I made the motion. If the Senate sees fit to vote the motion down, of course I shall bow to the will of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the Senator withheld the motion. Does he make it now?

Mr. LODGE. I make the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and am, therefore, compelled to withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I understand that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], with whom I have a pair, has not voted. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I transfer my pair to my colleague the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] are absent on account of illness.

I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. GAY. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is necessarily absent from the Senate.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are necessarily absent from the Senate.

I wish also to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are absent on public business.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 12, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 2, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 1, 1919.

This being the day fixed by the Constitution of the United States for the annual meeting of the Congress of the United States, the House of Representatives of the Sixty-sixth Congress, having been duly organized at the extra session beginning May 19 last, met in its Hall at 12 o'clock m. for the first regular session, and was called to order by the Speaker, Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father Almighty, in the swift flight of time Thou hast brought us to the beginning of the first regular session of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

The past has gone save for the results which have been woven into the tissues of our Republic. The future looms large before it, questions of great moment must be solved, hence our hearts turn to Thee for guidance.

Imbue the Speaker of this House and each Representative with wisdom, strength, courage, fortitude, that they may think deeply, act nobly, do justly, and meet the tasks before them with courageous hearts and leave behind them a record worthy of American statesmen, and thus add solidity, strength, and greater achievements to our Government; and all praise we will ascribe to Thee, in the name and spirit of the Master. Amen.

There was no objection.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. This is Monday, Unanimous Consent Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first bill upon the calendar.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES WITHIN THE FORMER FORT PECK INDIAN RESERVATION, MONT.

The first business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 183) providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries of lands within the former Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill was passed over on one or two previous calls of the calendar.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Twice at my request.

Mr. WALSH. I should like a little additional information, if somebody is in a position to give it, in addition to that which is contained in the report, as to why this Fort Peck Indian Reservation should be treated a little differently in respect to the time for the payment of the purchase money?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, the situation is this: The Fort Peck Indian Reservation is a strip of territory in northern Montana opened five or six years ago to homestead entry and under the appraised value of the land, ranging, as I understand, from $2 to $10. In other words, the homesteader complies with the homestead law and pays for the land in addition and the payments go to the Indians. Now, for three years they have had an unprecedented drought there and the people have simply not been able to make their payments and comply with the conditions of the homestead law, and this provides for an extension of time in which to make their payments, the people paying interest in advance on their payments for a period of two years.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the gentleman appreciates that Montana is not the only State in the Union that is subject to droughts, and why pass a special law for special conditions? I did not understand that when we legislated in reference to the payment of purchase price on these reservations for homesteads that we were taking into consideration the weather. It seems to me if these people have been unfortunate enough to locate on reservations where they have unfavorable weather conditions, they ought to try to make the best of it without coming in here and asking Congress to follow the weather.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Well, I think in a way the gentleman is right, and I would not be captious about the matter, but I recall three or four years ago there was a bad fire in Massachusetts and Congress appropriated money to take care of the people up there for the time being.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and the gentleman will recollect that the Massachusetts people appropriated a great deal more than they asked from the Federal Congress. There is nothing here to show whether the State has been asked to do anything or any other agency except to say that the weather has prevented them from farming this reservation and making money enough to make their payments.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. It so happens it does. If these people were homesteaders pure and simple it would be different, but they are paying the Indians for the land also. These people are paying for it in advance by giving a two years' extension of time.

Mr. WALSH. If I understand the gentleman correctly, unless these people are given relief what they have there will be lost?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. They will have lost all the improvements of their land and lost everything because they simply can not remain there and live. They can not live upon that barren territory without relief, and they would have to go away and abandon their homesteads.

Mr. FRENCH. May I suggest that a similar case was acted favorably upon in northern Idaho just a few years ago, and then another thing we should bear in mind is that the money that these settlers pay does not go to the Government, but goes to the Indians. It belongs to the Indians, and, more than that——

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the Indians have no money anywhere.

Mr. FRENCH. This will be held in trust for the Indians by the Government, and they will receive a higher rate of interest from the farmers than would be allowed to them from the Government for the trust fund. I think it is to the interest of the Indians that the extension be made as much as to the settlers.

Mr. WALSH. Financially?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask why it is this bill went to the Committee on the Public Lands instead of to the Committee on Indian Affairs, if the Indians are interested in this money?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I can not say why it went there. It seems to have come from the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate and went to the Committee on the Public Lands of the House.

Mr. HASTINGS. If these are public lands and the Indians are interested in them, it occurs to me that this bill when it came from the Senate should have been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs rather than to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I know that a similar bill passed the Senate last session and went to the Public Lands Committee, and was favorably reported in the House.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does this bill provide for payment of interest to the Indians?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. The money is paid into the hands of the Government and is placed to the credit of the Indians, because it was originally Indian land.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit, I want to ask the gentleman from Montana if it is not a fact that in some of these cases the payments are due not only for one year but due for two or three years back?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I think none of them are due for three years, but possibly some of them are due for two years.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, at the same time there was a drought in the State of Montana there was an unprecedented drought in Colorado and New Mexico and part of Idaho and in the greater portion of Texas, lasting in the last-named State three years, and the people of the State of Texas saw fit, when they could not get help elsewhere, to provide help for the people who needed it themselves. What has Montana done, if anything, in that respect?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that Montana has done anything in this particular case. I do know that the Government of the United States provided money with which to take care of the stockmen and people living in the drought-stricken districts of Texas last year.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no. All it did was this, that the Treasury placed money on deposit in certain national banks, and the Government was protected for every dollar it placed there. It placed money on deposit in certain national banks in Texas, and the banks themselves loaned money to the cattlemen. The Government did not pay out money itself to the stockmen, but only furnished credit to the banks.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. The Government here is only allowing some people who have made a contract with the Government to pay some money to the Indians. It is just a question now of whether or not you have foreclosed the mortgage under these adverse circumstances.

Mr. BLANTON. If this extension is granted, is there any hope that they will ultimately pay the land out?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. They think so, because they ask for this extension. If they do not get it they will lose their money and the land.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is there any time specified in this bill within which these people must avail themselves of the privilege given as to payments now past due?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. It is to extend the payment for a years that is past due, and then give them an opportunity in that time to have a further extension of one year. The payments are due, and the Government says they must make their payments now or take advantage of the extension.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is nothing in the bill fixing the time in which they must pay?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I think not.

Mr. CRAMTON. Further, I note it appears that while in other extensions the interest shall be paid in advance, in this case even the interest which these parties must pay, according to the bill, does not have to be paid at the time the extension is granted. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to allow them additional time without limit for the payment of even the interest.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I think the gentleman is in error.

Mr. CRAMTON. The language of the bill is "by paying interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum * * * within such time as may be prescribed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Interior." Would the gentleman be agreeable to an amendment that would specify that these people must, within the specified time of 30 or 60 days from the taking effect of this act, take advantage of it, if they desire to do so, and, further, that at the time they make application for such extension of time they make their payment of interest?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes; I would be willing to accept such an amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Or something of that kind?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I am perfectly sure it is the intention of the authors of the bill to provide that the interest shall be paid in advance. No extension is made until interest is paid.

Mr. CRAMTON. The language is quite different. I think from the reading of the language of the bill that the gentleman will admit it reads like the department drew it. That is just the worst thing I can say about it, because they turn out bad pieces of legislation down there. But I would much prefer such an amendment. If the gentleman is agreeable to it I will not object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, what is the necessity for enacting legislation based upon a need arising out of drought conditions there which will render similar legislation in the future unnecessary? In line 16, page 2, the bill says that "any payments so extended may thereafter be extended for a period of one year in like manner." It seems to me this opens wide the door for future extensions of time.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I think the intention is to make it possible to extend these payments for two years, not for one year, a second extension making it two years.

Mr. ANDERSON. The reason for that is that they are one year behind now.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes; they are one year behind now.

Mr. WALSH. This language permits that now.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I think not.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The language permits an extension for a hundred years. And it may be proper, too.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, if the gentleman admits it is proper, the bill should come in here as a general extension bill and not seek to come in here for one year on account of drought conditions.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That may be true, but here is the actual situation: This bill was introduced before the drought this year was so bad.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They want an extension of time regardless of this year.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Now, along comes the drought this year in Montana, which, I suppose from the newspaper reports, is the worst they have ever had out there.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. The worst in 50 years.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Here is a bill that proposes to extend the time of payment one year upon the payment of interest. But that time would have expired, I think, the first of this year, practically, in most cases. They can not make that payment owing to the drought this year. Now, this other provision would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time another year.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And it authorizes him indefinitely. If they have a drought another year they would need that extension. Of course it does leave to the administrative officer of the Government who deals with land the authority to extend the time of payment in this particular case from year to year upon the payment of 5 per cent interest. As a rule, however, the administrative officers of the Government are not very specially tender to the interests of these settlers, and I have no doubt they will be required to pay the money if there is a possible chance to squeeze any juice out of a dry orange. That is what these men are out there now—practically dry oranges.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Practically that is so.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. After the drought.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Well, the proviso beginning on line 16, as the gentleman will notice, permits an extension for any other reason than a drought.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WALSH. And more than one extension.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Now, it seems to me, if this is a bill to take care of drought conditions, we ought not to embark upon general legislation to take care of all sorts of contingencies.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course this only applies to one particular reservation. I am not sure but there ought to be a general provision of law covering this subject. I do not believe that the Government should invite or permit citizens of the United States to go upon these dry lands and then exact the last penalty from them if they fail to make the payments on it. No private individual would do that. We grant extensions of time all over the United States everywhere to people who have borrowed money from private individuals. If you borrow money from the Farm Loan Board you have—what is it? Forty years——

Mr. PLATT. Thirty-four years——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In which to pay it back. These people who go upon these lands, it goes without saying, have not a great deal of money or they would not go on the land, and when they go on the land to farm under the very hardest kind of conditions, and along comes nature and makes it impossible for them to meet the payments required by law, what harm is there, instead of taking away what they have put upon the land, thus sending them to the poorhouse, or practically that elsewhere, in giving an extension of time to them upon a rate of interest which is higher than the Government pays to the Indians if they have paid the money into the Federal Treasury?

Mr. RIDDICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. RIDDICK. There is one point in connection with this bill that ought to be made clear, in my judgment. These settlers went upon this land a few years ago when weather conditions were good, and at that time they thought they could make their payments nicely. Many of them invested their whole life savings in improvements upon these lands, and now if they lose them they lose not only the lands but the improvements on the lands in which they have invested their life savings and which they have placed there. Montana has had three successive years of drought in this community. The banks have made generous loans, and the counties in Montana have made liberal loans and rendered aid in the way of seeds and other things, and the State itself has been generous to these settlers; but in spite of that, after three years of drought, the settlers find themselves unable to make their payments, and under the provisions of the law the Government is bound to take this land away from the settlers and turn it back to the Indians. I do not think the Indians want to see that done, and I do not think Congress wants to do that. I think they ought to have time to work their way out.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. These lands, as I understand, are on the Fort Peck Indian Reservation?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARTER. They have been so ever since the unallotted lands were sold?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. How does it happen that the bill goes to the Committee on the Public Lands?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. That question was asked by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS]; I do not know.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, it is obvious this bill should have gone to the Committee on Indian Affairs. It has no business with the Committee on the Public Lands. Since it deals with the sale of unallotted Indian lands the Committee on Indian Affairs certainly has jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, of course this bill was referred at the desk. A Member of the House introduces a bill, and it is a common practice for the Member to indicate on the bill the committee to which he thinks it should be referred. That indication is, of course, not binding on the one who makes the reference.

Mr. CARTER. I understand that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But this is a Senate bill, and there is no indication as to what committee it should be referred to. On the face of the bill, both the title and the substance of the bill would lead a person not familiar with the particular facts relating to the bill to suppose that it belonged to the Committee on the Public Lands. Now, it is the duty of the Committee on Indian Affairs to keep track of all of these bills that are referred, and it was the duty, theoretically at least, of the gentleman from Oklahoma, the former chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, or some one else on that committee, to suggest to the House that this bill belonged to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CARTER. I am suggesting that now.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Such a reference or change of reference would have been made without objection. Of course, the Committee on Indian Affairs does not lose jurisdiction. I think myself that it should have been sent to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but it was not through anybody's fault.

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman from Illinois knows that there are about 20,000 to 35,000 bills introduced during every Congress. When I was chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs I did undertake to look after the bills that, with proper reference, should have been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but I found it a pretty difficult task to go through all of these bills, as the gentleman knows. I assume that one thing which did happen here was that when this reference was made in the Senate it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. When it came over to the House the clerk at the desk, having noted that reference in the Senate, naturally referred it to the Committee on the Public Lands in the House. I do not charge anyone with any blame, but I want to say that in the future when these bills come on the floor of the House they must come through the front door, and all bills over which the Indian Committee has jurisdiction must have appropriate consideration by such committee. I understand the urgent necessity for the passage of this bill and shall not object to its consideration at this time, but I want to serve notice that hereafter bills belonging to committees of which I am a member must be reported properly from those committees or I shall feel obliged to object to consideration by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the jurisdiction, I desire to call attention to the fact that a great many of these bills have gone to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CARTER. That does not make it right.

Mr. STEENERSON. Bills for the payment of money out of the ceded Indian lands have been referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CARTER. They should not be.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes, they should, for the reason that the Committee on Indian Affairs has no jurisdiction in these matters when the act is proposed to cede the land to the United States——

Mr. CARTER. The gentleman is mistaken about this bill; there is no land ceded to the United States; the land was sold for the Indians by the Interior Department and the money paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Indian tribe.

Mr. STEENERSON. The act is analogous to the cession of land in other States where lands are opened to homestead entry upon a certain amount due the Indians, and that is administered by the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CARTER. That may be true; but these were Indian lands and have been ever since they were set aside for a reservation. It is true that the homestead procedure was made to apply, but the lands were sold by the Government for the Indians, the money when collected goes to the credit of the Indians, it is administered on by the Indian Bureau, and must eventually be distributed among the Indians or used for their benefit. These Indians may be in more destitute straits than the homesteaders, they may need these very payments even worse than the settlers. Now, who can best give that information, the Public Lands Committee or the Committee on Indian Affairs? There is no reason on earth why this bill should ever have gone to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. STEENERSON. In Minnesota and the public-land States the ceded Indian lands are administered by the General Land Office.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly; but the only thing in question here is the payment of the funds, and to whom do the funds belong when paid? They are due the Indians; they do not go into the Treasury fund but are paid into the Treasury as an Indian fund, to be distributed among the Indians. The Committee on the Public Lands does not have anything to do with Indian affairs, and they could not know what the Indians need. They could not tell the House whether the Indians need the money. If this had been looked into by the proper committee, it might have been demonstrated that the Indians need the money right now.

Mr. STEENERSON. They would not get it.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. A short while ago we were debating a bill on the floor that provided that the settlers might lease lands, and they had to go out and do day's labor in order to make repayment. The crops were a failure, and we have this situation which has been disclosed here to-day.

Now, these men are not interested as to whether this bill should go to the Committee on the Public Lands or the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CARTER. But Members of Congress are interested in it.

Mr. JUUL. They are sitting out there in a drought-stricken piece of territory.

Mr. CARTER. I think I can cut this conversation short by repeating that I am not going to object to this bill, but I expect in the future to object to all such irregular and unsafe procedure.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands the regular order. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc, That any person who has made homestead entry under the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 30, 1908 (35 Stat. L., 558), entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all the surplus lands after allotment," may obtain an extension of time for one year from the anniversary of the date of entry last preceding the passage of this act within which to pay the one-half of the installment then due or such part of any preceding installment, where payment has not yet been made and where an extension of time therefor is not authorized by the act of Congress approved March 2, 1917 (39 Stat. L., 994), by paying interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on the sums to be extended from the maturity of the unpaid installments to the expiration of the period of extension, the interest to be paid to the receiver of the land office for the district in which the lands are situated, within such time as may be prescribed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the one-half of any installment which becomes due within one year from the passage of this act and for which an extension of time for payment is not authorized by the said act of March 2, 1917, may also be extended for a period of one year by paying interest thereon in advance at the said rate: Provided further, That any payment so extended may thereafter be extended for a period of one year in like manner: And provided further, That if commutation proof is submitted, all the unpaid payments must be made at that time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to section 1.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CRAMTON moves to strike out in lines 9 and 10, page 2, the words "within such time as may be prescribed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided," and insert in lieu thereof "Provided, That in order to secure such extension application therefor must be made within 90 days from the time this act takes effect and the said interest shall be tendered with the application: Provided further."

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the amendment. This amendment provides that these people shall make this payment within 90 days from the passage of this act. It is now midwinter with those people and probably a good many of them are off the land. They have been driven off by stress of weather conditions. They may not know this act has been passed or have opportunity to know anything about the proposition. It appears to me that if an amendment should be offered it should be within 90 days after the receipt of notice about the matter, that the Secretary should notify them in some way or other. It would be manifestly——

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I will.

Mr. JUUL. What would happen if the notice came and they did not have any money?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. They simply could not make the payment, of course.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, of course the gentleman will recall this matter has been called to his attention before unanimous consent was granted, and I felt that in some form the gentleman should accept an amendment. It would seem to me hardly reasonable to put the matter in the form in which the gentleman has suggested, placing the burden of notice upon the Interior Department. If the gentleman would prefer to have it six months—I take it that these people are in no danger of losing their rights, they are interested in this legislation, they have Representatives in Congress who are interested in looking after their affairs, and certainly they will have notice as to the passage of the legislation. Now, if the gentleman thinks six months is better for the people than three months, I have no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I should prefer it be left as it is.

Mr. CRAMTON. It seems to me there should be some time limit, and that when they do make application the interest charge should accompany it.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Personally I think it ought to be left to the Secretary of the Interior to notify these people, within 30, 60, 90 days, or whatever it is, depending upon the conditions and circumstances at the time existing.

Mr. CRAMTON. This legislation, even with the gentleman's support, will probably not become a law before some time in the winter, and a period of six months will carry it well into next year. If I may have unanimous consent I will ask unanimous consent to vary my amendment and make it a period of six months instead of three months.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment so as to make it six months instead of three months. Is there objection?

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Speaker, I object. This is a Senate bill, and it passed the Senate, and I object to any amendment——

Mr. CRAMTON. I will ask, then, that the amendment be defeated, and I will offer a different amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the same amendment changing the 90 days to 6 months.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 9 and 10, amend by striking out the words "within such time as may be prescribed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That in order to secure such extension application therefor must be made within six months from the time this act takes effect and the said interest shall be tendered with the application: Provided further."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, in connection with this amendment I only want to say that I have no interest in the matter, but it would seem to me desirable that this should be put in a definite form. When the bill came before the House and before unanimous consent was granted I called the matter to the attention of the House and interrogated the gentleman from Montana having charge of the bill, and he expressed his willingness to accept some form of amendment, and by reason of that fact I withheld any objection which I otherwise would have made to the consideration of the bill. Now, this being a Senate bill, the adoption of this amendment will not endanger the bill or materially delay it. It will go to the Senate, and I have no doubt that the amendment will be promptly accepted and the matter disposed of. Hence I feel I am warranted in offering the amendment and asking for its adoption.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. What gain is there to come from this amendment? What are we to expect, what benefit, and to whom?

Mr. CRAMTON. In the first place, the bill is so obscurely drawn that it would seem very difficult for the department to know what course they should take in enforcing it. There is no time limit. These men may in 10 years from now make this application and may be entitled to a hearing. There is nothing in the bill to limit the time within which they shall make this application. If the gentleman will permit, if a definite time is fixed, then the department will wait the running of that time before they take any steps to disturb these people in the possession of the property, and in six months, as the amendment suggests, they are secured from any difficulty whatever. So it is, in the first place, for the aid of the department, in order that they may know how to handle the matter, and next it is for the aid of the people on the land, because without some such definite provision the department might feel that after 30 days the parties had had enough time and might proceed to dispossess them. It is to the interest of the people as well to have a period within which they are protected. Furthermore, you are denying the Indians the payment of the principal to which they are entitled, and then you have a provision in the bill here that says that the Secretary of the Interior may postpone for 10 years, if he chooses, the time within which that interest shall be paid. And I feel those things should be fixed in the bill.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If there is anybody on earth that has a hard time it is the homesteader in a dry country. He may not feel the need of making an application at this time, or within 30 days, or 60 days, or 90 days, or even 6 months, but in 7 months the times may change, and you are going to limit it so that the Secretary of the Interior can not take care of his case.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman knows that the only people who will be limited to the six months are those who are already in arrears. If they do not know yet that they need the extension they can not need it very badly. As to the further extensions, then the Secretary is authorized to grant them, and there is nothing in my amendment to affect those.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The effect of your amendment would strike out the further extension entirely.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is not the intention.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But that is the effect.

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not agree with the gentleman, because the bill, down to line 10 on page 2, has to do entirely with payments that are now past due, and it stipulates the payment of interest, and so forth, and then goes on to say that that interest, which it has been discussing in the first part of page 2, shall be paid "within such time as may be prescribed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Interior." Then we go on and have the proviso:

That the one-half of any installment which becomes due within one year from the passage of this act, and for which an extension of time for payment is not authorized by the said act of March 2, 1917, may also be extended for a period of one year—

And so forth. None of that is stricken out. It remains in the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know that the provision—

Provided further, That any payment so extended may thereafter be extended for a period of one year in like manner.

Would include with it the amendment of the gentleman, which would mean, although you wanted application to extend for another year, you have got to make the application to pay the interest within six months of the passage of this act, which, of course, would be impossible, as the time would not exist.

Now, I would like to say a word about the gentleman's amendment. Mr. Speaker, this bill was originally introduced in the last Congress, and the favorable report was made upon it April 27, 1918. That is nearly two years ago. At that time the department believed it was desirable to extend the time of payment to these homestead settlers. Nearly two years have passed away since that time, and two of the hardest years probably that have ever been known in this part of Montana. These settlers have not recuperated within this two years' time. They will not be able to make the payment promptly, if this bill passes, within one year's time. They will need a further extension. Nobody will be injured by the Government granting them the further extension of time. The Indians will not get any more money by taking this land away from these homesteaders and giving it to somebody else. The Government will not benefit by taking the land away from these homesteaders. The interest of everybody is conserved and benefited by having these people keep these lands, if it be possible to do so.

Now, this bill, which was drawn two years ago, authorizes, in the first instance, the extension of one year. That is direct. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], who is very careful about these land bills and who deserves commendation for his care concerning them, offers an amendment which will require application for the extension to be accompanied by the interest and to be presented within six months of the passage of the act. That will not authorize an extension next year. The Secretary is only authorized to grant an extension for one year at a time, and if, under the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, a man makes an application now for extension and pays his interest, then he can not get a further extension, because he can not make his application and pay the interest for the next extension within six months from the passage of the act. Nor do I see any occasion for Congress endeavoring to specify exactly when the interest shall be paid. The legislation is to give these men an opportunity to extend their rights upon these lands if they pay 5 per cent interest. They make the application and the Secretary determines when they shall pay the interest. I do not see why we should undertake to say just when they will pay it. One man may be able to pay it to-day and another man may be able to borrow money and pay it six months from now.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. GARD. Is not the provision which the gentleman has referred to, on lines 16 and 17, extending payment for an additional year, the provision referred to by the Secretary when he says that this bill makes similiar legislation unnecessary? Is not that a proper provision, and would it not be affected seriously by the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think it would be affected very seriously by the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, and I think it is a highly desirable provision in the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is not this the procedure? Certain settlers are in arrears; this bill is intended to give them the right to get from the Secretary of the Interior an extension of one year for the payment of certain sums. We will say that that sum became due the 1st of November last. This would enable the Interior Department to extend that time one year from the 1st of November. Now, I do not seek to change that, but I do seek to fix a time limit within which these settlers must move; that is, six months from the time this becomes a law, and that would be about the 1st of June or July. They make application, then, to the Interior Department for an extension of time, and thereupon the Secretary gives them an extension of time from the 1st of November, running then until the next November. Then later the proviso in line 16 follows, that such payments having been extended, they may be extended afterwards for another year. That is a matter that would come up the 1st of November next year.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But it says "in like manner."

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes; in like manner; but in order to remove any question I would be glad to put this in as an amendment:

Insert after the word "extension," in the second line, the words "for payments now past due."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not think the gentleman's amendment ought to go into the bill at all. I am perfectly frank about that.

Mr. CRAMTON. Let us remove this one difficulty that the gentleman calls attention to. In order to remove the objection I would be glad to put those words in.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have no objection to having them inserted.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert the words "for payments now past due" in my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment of Mr. CRAMTON by inserting after the word "extension" in the second line the words "for payments now past due."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment as it will read when modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on line 9 and 10, page 2, the words "within such time as may be prescribed for that purpose by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided," and insert in lieu thereof "Provided, That in order to secure such extension for payments now past due application therefor must be made within 90 days from the time this act takes effect, and the said interest shall be tendered with the application: Provided further."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the language on page 2, lines 16 and 17.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 2, beginning with line 16, strike out the words:

"Provided further, That any payments so extended may thereafter be extended for a period of one year in like manner."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced to cover an emergency arising out of drought conditions in this particular section of Montana. The language here would permit further extensions, not because of drought or emergency conditions of similar nature but for any reason whatever, and you are writing permanent legislation with reference to the time of payment for this particular Fort Peck Indian Reservation and giving them the privilege of having their time extended, which request was based upon drought conditions, and giving them the privilege of having the time extended for any reason whatever. To that extent you are giving them preference and rights not possessed by other homesteaders in other sections who may have perfectly good reasons for asking for an extension of time. They may not have experienced drought, but they may have had misfortunes which resulted in their not being able to realize on their crops. They may have had illness in their families, and there may be other reasons which prevent them from making payments, and yet they can not come under any sort of legislation and get an extension of time unless they come in and get a separate bill passed.

Now, I think if we grant these people an extension of time under this bill, as it is framed, we are doing all that is required under the circumstances, and I do not believe that under special legislation, depending upon special conditions, we should write a bill which, as the Assistant Secretary of the Interior says, will by its language take care not only of this situation but will render similar legislation in the future unnecessary, so far as these lands are concerned. I do not believe we ought to enact legislation, so far as these lands are concerned, granting the right of extension of time of payment; a right that is not possessed by any of the other Indian reservations which have been thrown open to homestead settlement, and for that reason I believe we would be justified, even upon the representation made here in the report of the committee and in the statements of those who have spoken in behalf of this bill, in eliminating this language. If we are going to extend the time of these homesteaders let us enact a general law and provide for an extension of time and give the Secretary of the Interior or the parties having jurisdiction the discretion to grant general extensions.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does not the gentleman from Massachusetts recognize that these homesteaders are having a very serious time of it? Does he not realize that they have not in the last three years grown enough on these homesteads to feed their families?

Mr. WALSH. That is true. I have listened to the testimony, and if we are to legislate in this manner let us turn this matter over to the Weather Bureau, so that when they have a drought payments will be made easy, and when they have a good season the terms of payment will be made harsh.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. This is a very serious matter. This is a life-and-death matter with these people. This is not a joke for the homesteader.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman answer me and say why we should treat these people any different because they have had a drought—and we are going to remedy that situation—why we should open the door to further extentions of time, not on account of drought conditions, but for any cause which they may present to the Secretary?

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That would be discretionary with the Secretary.

Mr. WALSH. Then why yield him the power to do it? If he is not going to do it, why pass the law? This was a special bill introduced in the Senate and passed there, based upon the fact that this drought had overtaken these settlers. We are all willing to pass this legislation to remedy that situation, but you are going far beyond that. You are granting this authority to extend the time for periods of one year, without limit, in such a manner as to make unnecessary any future legislation with reference to the extension of the time of payment. If you are going to grant that privilege of extension to the Fort Peck Indian Reservation on account of the drought and not on account of any other misfortune which this is particularly intended to cover, why not write a general law?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt about a very trying situation in Montana, and I presume that under the circumstances we are fully justified in extending the time of payments on the Fort Peck Reservation for another year. They had a drought last summer, the most severe in all the history of that section. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I want to say that whatever the House may do——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts may be extended five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to say that whatever the House may do in regard to this bill I should certainly regret to have the policy proposed extended generally, and for this reason, that under this extraordinary policy we might develop a situation where very great areas of land would be permanently reserved from the payment of taxes. So long as the title to these lands remains in the Government—and it will remain in the Government until the payments are all made, I assume, although there is nothing in the bill to guard that—a condition may easily be created in which there would be a very considerable area of country in which there would never be any taxes paid.

Just how gentlemen expect they are going to be able to maintain schools, build roads, and care for the institutions of the Government under these conditions I do not know. In the country to which this law applies 5 per cent is a very low rate of interest. The average settler pays nearer 10 per cent on his ordinary loans. If he can secure a delay of payment indefinitely of the sums due on his land and pay only 5 per cent interest on the deferred payments, and thereby avoid the payment of taxes, he will continue that condition just as long as it is possible to do it. This kind of legislation may be satisfactory to the gentleman from Montana. I am somewhat surprised that the Committee on Public Lands has indorsed it. To me it seems the worst sort of legislation in connection with a situation like this, if it is to be followed generally or extensively, because it would create a condition under which we would have areas which never could be self-supporting, because the land would not be subject to taxation. It seems to me that the present conditions of drought could be easily taken care of without legislation like this.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Wyoming consumed all of my time?

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from Massachusetts has two minutes remaining.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, in further support of this amendment I desire to say that, it seems to me, if we are going to extend the time beyond the period necessary to enable these men to make up the payments which have been defaulted because of the drought, it might have been done by so framing the language as to permit the extension because of drought conditions and the repetition of drought conditions which occasioned the default in payments. If it is unwise, as the gentleman from Wyoming states, to extend the time generally by a general law, I think it unwise to pick out one particular reservation because of a drought in that State and say that you can have an extension of one year on making such a showing as the public official may require, and say to other reservations that we can not extend your time because we are not authorized to extend the time of payment. Therefore I submit that this does not affect the remedial effect of the legislation at all by striking out this language. We permit them to take care of these settlers who have made default of payment because of the severe drought, and if you strike out the language I have indicated you simply say that Congress does not desire to embark on a policy of extension in the future for any reason that the settlers may set up.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts will not be agreed to. It would practically destroy the bill. After all, we are loaning, it is said, a great many million dollars to people over in Europe who need assistance. We are every day being asked to contribute funds for the purpose of putting up buildings, restoring villages and farms in territory which was devastated over there.

Now, here is a proposition to permit some man or woman who went into the dry territory of the country and endeavored to establish a home, under a homestead claim, for which they paid, or were to pay, but who met with conditions of nature beyond belief almost at the time. Here is a proposition for the Government to do what? To give them the land, to build them homes, to buy stock for them? Not at all. Not to give them anything except time, and that for money; not to give them anything but an extension of time of payment, with 5 per cent interest. There is nothing very wicked about it. Why, this morning I received a check from a man to pay last year's interest upon a mortgage on property which I sold to him 10 or 13 years ago, the mortgage being due probably 10 years ago. I am glad to extend the time personally from year to year, although the interest has never been kept up to date, and there never has been the maximum interest charged as allowed by the contract or by law.

Why should the Government of the United States, seeking to help these people and people its territory, be meaner than the individual would be? I claim no special grace for my leniency; it is common practice. It is what everybody knows. Give these people endeavoring to settle the dry West under adverse conditions—and most of them will fail probably at the best—give them every opportunity at least which the Government can afford. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] on behalf of the West in general, and especially on behalf of the struggling homesteaders throughout the Western States, for his magnificent, eloquent, splendid, and just appeal for the settlers on the public domain. I want to say further that if this House during the past 10 or 15 years had exhibited the same spirit of generosity, humanity, patriotism, fair dealing, and ordinary common sense and common justice toward the western people that is indicated by the remarks just delivered by the gentleman from Illinois we would have twice as many inhabitants in the Western States as we have to-day. It has been because of this harsh and utterly unwarranted policy shown here to-day; this critical and microscopic examination, picayunish interference, and narrow-minded, begrudging statesmanship toward the development of our country; this constant harrassing of everybody who tries to get a home upon the public domain or who tries to open up or improve any of the resources on the public domain; it is very largely because of that policy, so-called conservation, that hostile manner of treatment by Congress and the Interior Department and the Agricultural Department, that the West has not been settled up the way it ought to have been and is not now being developed as it should. When a man goes on the public domain to-day to make a home on the character of land that is now left open to settlement he has got to wear out his life on that piece of ground to make a home that will support himself and family.

It is a fight of a generation, with nearly everything against him. He has to heroically brave and endure a thousand hardships, privations, and heartbreaking disappointments that none of you gentlemen from the older States can ever realize or appreciate, and what inducement is there for a new settler to go out when he reads the records of Congress, reads the proceedings of our unanimous-consent days in this House for the past 10 years, and sees the nagging, picayunish criticism and aggravating obstruction of everything that is absolutely and imperatively necessary for the development of that country? What is the sense or reason or excuse for this attitude? Why should the West be penalized this way? Who can blame people for being skeptical and hesitating about going out there to try to make a home and endeavor to develop that country and people up the great West, when a large per cent of Congress, who know nothing whatever about the public-land legislation or the conditions that obtain out there, are constantly obstructing and preventing every just appeal they make? I have sat here every hour constantly on every unanimous-consent Monday after Monday for nearly 11 years trying, with the other western Members, to obtain imperative legislation for our country, measures so plain and self-evidently just that no one, it would seem, could have the heart to object to them, matters in which there was no politics and for which all the western Members have been united for the development of that country. And yet this is a fair example to-day. We have now sat here and spent an hour and a half haggling and heckling on a little bill that ought to be passed in two minutes. I have no personal concern about this particular bill. I am complaining about this time-killing, harassing, obstructive attitude of some Members of the House toward western measures. I say, What encouragement is there for anybody to try to develop our western country out there? With Members of the House in this frame of mind, what inducement is there for a man to spend all of his life on a piece of worthless land trying to help Uncle Sam and at the same time to get a home in response to the noblest instinct of the human race, that of trying to build a home for himself and his family? If there ever was a class of people on earth that deserve the good will and kind consideration of Congress, it is the public-land settlers of the arid West. And yet they always get this petty, narrow, harping, carping, picayunish, harassing, technical disputes and dissection, and drastic and impractical restrictions of all these western bills whenever we try to help the people out in that country to get a home or do anything toward developing that country. It does seem to me, if there is any one sentiment or habit in Congress that ought to be condemned, it is this most unjust and unkind spirit of distrust and incredulity and cruel infliction of untold and useless hardships upon these poor people simply because they can not help themselves. We of the West have got only about 8 per cent of the membership on the floor of this House. If we only had the membership in numbers to compel fair treatment, we would not have all this nagging that we are compelled to endure in order to get through a few little bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. Under the rules of the House, practically speaking, the only way we ever can get our bills considered is on this calendar. Every one of these bills on this calendar ought to be passed, and passed within an hour, and without objections, unless some one who knows about the conditions knows some reason for objecting to or amending them. No western Member ever sets himself up as the special guardian of the whole country or of any portion of it that he knows nothing about.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I regret very much that the gentleman from Colorado has assumed to scold the Members of the House because of the interest they take in the bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. When one looks at the Calendar for Unanimous Consent as it appears to-day we find that practically nine-tenths of the bills thereon come from the Committee on the Public Lands. Now, I think Members of the Congress and Members of the House of Representatives are disposed to be very fair, but we know, those of us who examine the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, that practically the whole Calendar is an assemblage of bills reported from the Committee on the Public Lands. Now, if those of us who are not members of the Committee on the Public Lands, those who come from States where public lands are no longer available, if we are to sit here and take everything which the Committee on the Public Lands prescribes, then we are due to swallow some awful doses, and I think it is entirely to the credit of the membership of this House and those Members who do not come from those public-land States to take an interest in these things, because the Calendar for Unanimous Consent is properly a calendar for the consideration of bills to which there is little or no opposition and where no new principles of legislation are laid down, and I am sure that the Committee on the Public Lands has as much consideration in this House, if not more consideration, than any committee that comes before it. What I immediately rose for was to say that it seems to me that the legal aspect of this amendment which is proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts eliminates a very necessary feature of this bill. I think this is an emergency bill, and an emergency does not mean that every time a particular condition exists that the law must be renewed, therefore the emergency applies to this particular bill. This is territory in the Fort Peck Indian Reservation which is intended to be covered by legislation so that an emergency might be met. Now, what is the emergency? As the gentleman from Illinois said, this bill has been pending here for two years or more. It may be that an emergency will exist next year. It does exist this year because of the failure of crop conditions. It may be so unfortunate that the emergency may exist next year, but it is necessary that this second proviso extending payment for a period of one year thereafter should be contained therein; otherwise we are met with the necessity of bringing this bill back again in practically the same form in six months, or less than six months, for the purpose of Congress meeting the emergency.

Now, this bill applies, I am told, to about 200 people out there who are struggling along with this development of Indian land. I believe they should be encouraged. I think the language contained in the second proviso is absolutely necessary if this is to be regarded as emergency legislation. To strike it out would simply offer to take care of one branch of the dilemma and not take care of another situation which is equally bad, and would result immediately, or within a short time at least, in another bill being brought in here to take care of practically the same situation. This bill takes care of an emergency in a limited territory for a particular purpose. It is not laying down a general proposition. It is ready to protect this one emergency, these few people who are there endeavoring to make homesteads for themselves. And I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will not be adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That moneys paid as interest provided for herein shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the Fort Peck Indians, the same as moneys realized from the sale of the lands.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

It is pleasing to know that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] has joined hands with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in furthering the passage of this so-called emergency legislation. I suppose some Members who seek to keep informed on the passage of legislation in the House ought to feel utterly crushed at the legislative scolding of the gentleman from Colorado. But, Mr. Speaker, the attitude of these same western Members, comprising about 8 per cent of the membership of the House, in seeking to further legislation for the benefit of and protection of these poor homesteaders who make up a respectable portion of the population of these States, is not such as to warrant Members in giving the Committee on the Public Lands free scope in reporting legislation. They come in here with measures which upon their face say that these homesteaders are charity patients of Uncle Sam, and Uncle Sam must put his hands into the Treasury and help them out upon all occasions when they seek to appeal to him for aid. Now, the Congress has been favorably disposed toward these homesteaders, and the men who have gone in to develop mines and mineral lands, and so forth, particularly during the war emergency. But we find it does not make any difference whether the department which is appointed for the purpose of supervising public-land affairs, or Indian affairs, or forest-reservation affairs, and various other matters relating to the interests of the Government, recommend these measures or not, we find that these western Members are sufficiently influential upon committees to have reports brought in here favoring projects which the department, in many instances, are very bitterly opposed to.

I want to assure the gentleman from Colorado, as far as I am personally concerned, that I have never attempted to indulge in any nagging or any picayunish criticism or any petty politics upon any of these measures, and he knows well that I have voted for a great many of them. But I do believe that it is within the province of any single Member of this House, whether he comes from a public-land State or the more thickly settled portion of the country, to ask questions about any bill, particularly when it is sought to put it through here by unanimous consent, and that he is entitled to a reply if people are able to give the information, and that unless somebody indulges in obstructive tactics it comes with rather poor grace from the gentleman from Colorado, who is an expert upon these matters and who knows these things right off the bat, to indulge in scolding rather than seeking to give information.

Many of us would like to know what these measures mean or what the effect of them is going to be, and I think we are entitled to an answer. But I have not seen upon this measure any nagging or microscopic, picayunish criticism, or anything of that sort. I offered an amendment, which I think ought to be adopted, and I think without that amendment having been adopted we pass legislation general in scope as applied to this particular reservation, and giving them a preference that is not given to the other reservations under similar conditions.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] has called attention to the fact that the Committee on Public Lands has several measures upon the calendar. It always has, and it necessarily must have. But I think the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] will seek to impart information when gentlemen arise to offer amendments or ask questions which they try to make intelligent—and sometimes it is difficult to make questions intelligent to some gentlemen here—that they are entitled to a respectful answer, and not have a statement made as a statement of fact here on the floor, glorifying the poor homesteader—and he is entitled to all the glory he can get—but condemning the man who is seeking to get information in order that he may vote intelligently.

There have been measures that have gone through the House by unanimous consent, relating not only to public-land matters but to other matters, that Members have lived to regret that they did not ask a few questions about before they permitted action upon them. So I trust the gentleman from Colorado will find when this splendid measure has become a law that it is possible to meet the problems arising from the Unanimous Consent Calendar, notwithstanding the glorious defense of the gentleman from Illinois, in a little smoother spirit and with a little more tolerance for Members who seek information before bills are enacted that are of great importance.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, just one moment.

I did not object to the taking up of this bill. I do not make a practice ordinarily of objecting to the consideration of bills by unanimous consent, but I do hope that the Committee on Public Lands does not contemplate the extension of the policy laid down in this bill. It is revolutionary. Yet it really amounts to the establishment of a leasing system covering Indian lands, a system under which, if the Secretary of the Interior is complacent—and in a majority of cases he will be, because he will be so constantly urged in the matter—a settler buying Indian lands may retain those lands indefinitely without paying for them upon the payment of 5 per cent per annum on a purchase price of a few dollars per acre. It establishes a system under which lands may be so held indefinitely and pay no taxes. I can think of nothing more pernicious than the policy which this bill inaugurates, and I hope it will be limited to the Fort Peck Agency, although I shall expect——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Colorado is generally sound in his views on public lands, and I am surprised that he favors this legislation. I shall expect that there will follow this legislation in the course of time a bill authorizing the issuance of patents without full payment, and following that, some further legislation relieving ultimately from any payment. It is a dangerous road we have entered upon under this legislation, whether we shall go further in the direction I have suggested or shall continue under the policy laid down in the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming that I do not think there is any ground for his fear about the Committee on the Public Lands bringing in any policy that would tend to anything in the nature of a leasing policy, or anything of that kind. But does not the gentleman know just as well as I do that it is the ambition and the earnest hope of every man in the West to obtain a patent just as soon as he can?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is generally the case with the right kind of settlers.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not generally so?

Mr. MONDELL. Every man who so desires will question this legislation, which would authorize his neighbor, after he had paid the sums due and received his patent and began to pay taxes—would authorize his neighbor to escape the payment of taxes indefinitely by appealing to the Secretary and by paying the small sum of 5 per cent of the balance due on his land. This is the first legislation I can recall in which we have contemplated a system under which public lands, Indian or otherwise, can be held indefinitely without patenting, and therefore without the payment of taxes, the only requirement being that the settler shall pay annually 5 per cent on a nominal purchase price.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HICKS. My point of order is that we are discussing the bill when the time has come to vote on the bill. The gentleman did not ask unanimous consent, and therefore he is out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman had already yielded the floor. The previous question had not been ordered; and if there is anything before the House, the gentleman has the right to discuss it. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A division is asked for.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 1.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. RIDDICK, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

PUBLIC LAND FOR NATIONAL SANITARIUMS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1125) to authorize the Secretary having jurisdiction of the same to set aside certain public lands to be used as national sanitariums by fraternal or benevolent organizations, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to call to the attention of the House one or two things in connection with this bill, even at the risk of falling within the large number of disreputable classifications which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] has enumerated. In connection with that I want to suggest this to the House, that I believe it is desirable not that fewer Members of the House from the East should give some attention to these public-land bills, but that more of us should do so. There are a few gentlemen in the House from the public-land States who know exactly what they want. They represent constituencies that make very serious demands upon them, and at times it becomes very embarrassing to those gentlemen to restrain the omnivorous desires of their constituents in trying to annex all of the public land that is possible.

Now, in that situation it is very desirable that some of us who do not have to face that sentiment from home should be on guard, to take part in the deliberations upon these bills which affect not only the interests of the public-land States but the interests of the United States as well.

Now, the difficulty that we face in connection with that, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has suggested, is that we Members from the Eastern States are novices in these matters, while gentlemen like the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] are experts. As for myself, I have tried to learn something of these matters, but my effort has been almost a total failure, and I had come to the point where I had desired to put my faith in the judgment of those experts employed by the Federal Government in the Department of the Interior, depending upon them to safeguard the public interests and desiring to cooperate with them. Since the gentleman from Colorado has brought up this subject I want to suggest, however, that I have now reached the point where I do not feel that I can blindly follow the advice of the appointed officers of the Government in these matters. I can not follow the advice of the Interior Department, because it has become apparent that the Interior Department can neither draft legislation in proper language, so that it can intelligently present a program, nor can we depend upon them always to give us the information in the possession of the Government that we are entitled to.

I will not now discuss, as I shall discuss at some other time, a bill upon this calendar where the ground is taken from under suits brought in a court of the United States at the request of the Department of the Interior, where parties in direct fraud have secured or tried to secure title to the public land, and that iniquity having come to the attention of the Department of the Interior, that department very accommodatingly has O. K.'d legislation now pending before this House that will put an end to those suits and vest this land probably in the hands of these fraudulent claimants.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER. What question is pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. RUCKER. The question was not submitted by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the regular order demanded?

Mr. RUCKER. I want the regular order.

Mr. CRAMTON. The regular order is, Is there objection to this bill? I will object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill just objected to may remain on the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bill remain and go to the foot of the calendar.

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, I feel that sufficient time ought to elapse so that when the bill comes up again the House may be in a mood to give it consideration, and therefore I object.

Mr. RAKER. It would not come up to-day.

Mr. CRAMTON. I understand that.

LANDS FOR SCHOOLHOUSE SITE AND GROUNDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1124) to authorize entering of the public lands by school districts for schoolhouse site and ground.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from California who wrote the report on this bill to the fact that on page 5 it indicates that the bill has the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture. I notice on reading the letter of the Secretary that he distinctly objects to the inclusion of the national forests under the bill. If the gentleman from California insists on carrying out his program, I shall have to object.

Mr. CRAMTON. And with the permission of the gentleman I wish to call attention to the fact that it expressly provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall have the right to fix the rules and regulations as to the disposition of lands under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is true.

Mr. CRAMTON. And furthermore the selection of the land to be given to the school districts is entirely in the hands of the school district and the Interior Department can have no discretion.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, may I read the language referred to by the gentleman from Minnesota on page 5 of the report made by the gentleman from California?—

> The committee after full consideration is of the same opinion as the Secretary of Agriculture, that lands within national forests should not be eliminated from the provisions of the bill, and that there should be no possible objections to the building of schoolhouses with the necessary playground, recreation park, etc., in connection therewith in a forest reserve.

Mr. RAKER. That is a misprint.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. When did the gentleman discover that it was a misprint?

Mr. RAKER. Just now.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman ought to read the printed report. It is easy to say that it is a misprint, but it was not a misprint of the Printing Office.

Mr. RAKER. It is a typographical error.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is clearly a statement that is not true.

Mr. ANDERSON. In the preceding paragraph it says—

> The suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior that the bill, if enacted, be made applicable only to unreserved public lands was adopted by the committee and included in amendment No. 2.

That is not true.

Mr. RAKER. The committee took up each amendment separately——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That statement in the report is not true and is not borne out by the facts.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman read the quotation from the report again? I did not catch it.

Mr. ANDERSON (reading)—

> The suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior of having the time limit in which the school district shall construct suitable and a permanent school building thereon, and construct and maintain permanent wagon and automobile roads, is provided for in amendment No. 3.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have a notation opposite that "not true." Does the gentleman say that is a typographical error?

Mr. RAKER. The suggestion was made and an amendment was offered by the chairman of the committee. The committee believed that that covers the amendments offered by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior. That is the view the committee took of it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The committee evidently never looked at the bill. No sensible man could read and examine the bill and believe anything of the kind. You might as well say you believe black is white when it is right before you.

Mr. RAKER. The amendment was suggested and offered by the chairman of the committee and it was believed that it covered both points made by the Secretary of the department, so that there could be no question about it. You will find it on lines 7 and 8 of the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What is the use?

Mr. RAKER. That was the intention.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know what the intention was, but the intention of the report was to make people who read it believe that the committee had adopted the recommendations of the Secretary of Agriculture——

Mr. RAKER. Not at all. The report says:

> The Committee on the Public Lands fully considered the reports of the two Secretaries. The suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior that the bill, if enacted, be made applicable only to unreserved public lands was adopted by the committee and included in amendment No. 2.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is directly the reverse of the fact. The committee directly adopted the reservation to make this bill applicable to forest reserves.

Mr. RAKER. That is not the question. The question is not with reference to forest reserves, and the Secretary did not refer to them.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Secretary of the Interior expressly referred to the question of forest reserves and suggested that they be left out of the bill.

Mr. RAKER. The Secretary refers to the reserved land. Public reserved lands and forest reserves are different.

The committee adopted the amendment of the Agricultural Department eliminating reserved lands, including in the bill forest reserves, and the committee report is identically as it is stated and as the committee intended and as by a special vote in the committee it was placed in the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know how obtuse the committee may be, but here is the language of the Secretary of the Interior in the report upon this bill. The Secretary says:

> The Secretary of Agriculture, under date of April 12, 1917, has reported that no legislation along this line is needed for national forest reserve lands, the situation being taken care of by existing laws applicable to such reservations. I therefore suggest that the bill for enactment be made applicable only to unreserved public land.

Now, the meaning of that right on the face was that national forest reserve land should not be included, and thereupon the committee says it agreed to the recommendation and expressly inserts an amendment to include forest lands, directly the reverse of the fact.

Mr. RAKER. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I frequently have been mistaken, but I do not believe I am now.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Anybody can demand the regular order.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman will yield for that purpose.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Nobody has the floor except by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The parliamentary inquiry was, What is the status now? I understood that the bill was objected to. I hope, however, that objection was not made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman was under misapprehension. The question now is whether the bill shall be considered or not.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. My impression was that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] objected to the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. No; I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The proceeding is by unanimous consent under the reservation of the right to object.

Mr. RAKER. So that the House may fully understand, I just want a few moments in which to say this: This bill came before the committee, and a report of the Secretary of the Interior and a report of the Secretary of Agriculture were before the committee. The committee took up seriatim the suggested amendments by the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture. They adopted a couple of the amendments suggested by the Secretary of the Interior and possibly one by the Secretary of Agriculture, but the rest were not adopted. They ordered a report made. Upon the amendment in regard to which the suggestion was made, as read by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], in regard to the statement that the report of the committee and the report of the department are not in accordance I desire to say with due deference that the facts are that upon this first amendment the question was whether or not it included reserved public lands. There are public lands, reserved lands, and forest lands. Now, to eliminate and avoid that question the committee used the language that was adopted, as suggested by the chairman of the committee, upon an amendment which covered the Secretary's report and which reads as follows, so there can be no question. I read from page 1 of the bill, lines 7 and 8:

One-sixteenth quarter section of public lands not reserved for public use, other than a forest reserve.

They struck that out, and after the word "public" they inserted as follows:

Lands, or lands within a forest reserve, not otherwise reserved for public use.

In other words it allowed an entry upon public lands otherwise not reserved for public use, and second, in the forest reserves, and the three kinds of lands have been maintained before the committee and by the lawyers of the committee and by the Supreme Court. There is no question as to the committee's intention, and the language is clear that it permitted the filing only upon public lands that are not otherwise reserved, and second, upon lands in the forest reserves. The committee, I think unanimously—I will not say as to the number—voted down the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture that it do not include forest reserves, because they believe from the presentation of the matter, from the report of the Secretary of Agriculture himself, and the fact that there could be no objection to authorizing a sufficient amount of lands for school grounds and a park in connection therewith that it might go to the Government and title issue, to the end that school districts might build large schoolhouses, and the title might be in them and might not be at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture to revoke it at his discretion. Now, that is what the facts are. It is now presented to the House for its action, and there is no intention to the contrary. It covers the question clearly, and I trust the House will permit the legislation to come before it for its consideration, and if the House by its vote determines that the forest land shall not be included, why we will have to abide by its judgment.

Let me call the attention of the House to this, that there can not be any higher use of the land within the Government forest reserves in the West or elsewhere than to allow 10 acres of that land to be selected by a school district, fenced in for a playground, and get substantial schoolhouses and outbuildings, to the end that the community will develop and that the rising generation will have an opportunity to have all the beauties of nature surround them instead of being hampered and tied. There can be no question about it. Another question is the Secretary says that he has granted many permits for school purposes, but they are only temporary and they are subject to his revocation. Now, if that is the fact, it is a fact there can not be any objection to permitting this department to select, or rather the party to select, and then the department determine whether or not it shall be approved after it has been selected. It is in line with development, with progress——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, well, that is old. Get down to bedrock.

Mr. RAKER. I am.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, here is a bill that was introduced in the first place to give school districts authority to purchase school sites in public lands, and there may have been some question under the language of the bill as introduced whether it was applicable to lands in forest reserves. The bill was referred to the Secretary of the Interior, who made a report upon it. The bill was also referred to the Secretary of Agriculture, who made a report upon it. The Secretary of the Interior reported that the Secretary of Agriculture objected to having the bill include forest lands, and therefore suggested it be made to mean to include only unreserved public lands. The Secretary of Agriculture objected to having the forest reserve lands included in that bill, because it was not essential or necessary, he having authority now. Thereupon we find a report from the Committee on Public Lands stating in one place that the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior that the bill, if enacted, be applicable only to unreserved public lands was adopted by the committee and included in amendment No. 2, and in another place the statement that the committee, after full consideration, is of the same opinion as the Secretary of Agriculture, that lands within national forests should not be eliminated from the provisions of the bill. Now, the gentleman suggests that that is a typographical error. That is nonsense. It is not possible for that to be a typographical error.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is not possible for it to be a typographical error.

Mr. RAKER. Now, I want to say in regard to my statement of a moment ago that it was a typographical error that I was mistaken. It is not. It is identically as the committee agreed upon it and read it, and the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in criticizing the report is not a fact as the report reads.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have read the report word for word absolutely as it reads. I read the report as it reads, that both the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture reported in favor of leaving out forest reserves.

Mr. RAKER. That is not what the report says. There is not a word of that, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will read the statement again. The Secretary of the Interior, on page 3 of the report, under date of June 16, 1917, in the second paragraph of the report, says:

The Secretary of Agriculture, under date of April 12, 1917, has reported that no legislation along this line is needed for national-forest lands, the situation being taken care of by existing laws applicable to such reservations. I therefore suggest that the bill, if enacted, be made applicable only to unreserved public lands.

Now, if that is not a statement that the Secretary of Agriculture wanted forest lands left out of this bill, and that the Secretary of the Interior suggested that they be left out of the bill, I can not tell A from B. That is what he says.

Mr. RAKER. Just a moment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is not all. The Secretary of Agriculture makes the same recommendation in a letter. Thereupon the committee adopts an amendment specifically naming forest reserves to be included in the bill, there being some doubt whether they were included or excluded by the language of the bill before, I suppose, and then report that they have agreed to the recommendation, when the amendment is directly the reverse of the recommendation. It is a fraud upon the House.

Mr. RAKER. So that the House may fully understand it, and I will take but a moment, I will say that on page 5 of this report—and I want to call your attention particularly to it, because I am sure I am right—the Committee on the Public Lands fully considered the reports of the two Secretaries. Now, there is a period. Then we took up the report of the Secretary of the Interior and disposed of it. We then took up the report of the Secretary of Agriculture and disposed of it as follows:

The committee after full consideration is of the same opinion as the Secretary of Agriculture, that lands within national forests should not be eliminated from the provisions of the bill.

It says that the judgment of the committee is that it should not be eliminated, not what the Secretary stated. It is in his report. It is clear, distinct, and positive that the committee recommends, as to the Secretary of Agriculture's report, that they—forest-reserve lands—should not be eliminated from the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. Why does the committee say, then, that they are of the same opinion, and use the language "of the same opinion as the Secretary of Agriculture"?

Mr. RAKER. They do not say that.

Mr. ANDERSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I have not read this report, but it is a fact that the Agricultural Department did report that it was not in favor of the provision of this bill granting title to land for schoolhouses on the forest reserves. And we discussed it in the committee, and the majority of the committee was in favor of that provision. We thought schoolhouse grounds ought not to be limited to a mere permit, because sometimes it costs a lot of money to build a schoolhouse, and a majority of the committee, as I recall it now, was in favor of reporting the bill to the House disregarding that provision of the Secretary of Agriculture's report, because we did believe there could be no higher use of a 10-acre piece of land than to put a schoolhouse on it. If the House is in favor of supporting the Agricultural Department by cutting that provision out, all well and good, but that is the fact about that recommendation. Now, we believe they ought to allow a schoolhouse on the forest reserve or on any other kind of public land and give a title to it to the school district. If the House does not think so, but wants to restrict the schoolhouses to private land or land outside of the forest reserve, all well and good. That is all there is about this business.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does not the General Government make a grant to all of the States that would be affected by this of two sections in every township for school purposes?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; but, my dear sir——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is not that a fact?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; but that does not apply to mountainous districts.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If they did get the land they would pay them for it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In one way of looking at it, that is true.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Now, then, having given them two sections in every township, and they having wasted that, they want us to give them more land for schoolhouses in places where they might be very dangerous.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me answer that. In the mountainous portions of the West—and all forest reserves are in the mountainous portion of the West—these townships do not get sections 16 and 36. We select large compact bodies of public land in lieu of those sections, and consequently there are no school sections or school lands or sites in those mountainous portions of the Western States available for schoolhouses.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And you have very little use for school lands in forest reserves.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not suppose there would be a dozen schoolhouse sites taken in all the United States in these forest reserves. But in forest reserves, where the boundaries are zigzag or very irregular in shape, sometimes a schoolhouse in a forest reserve would be handy to the settlers living adjoining and on both sides.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. As I understand, the committee was not of the same opinion as the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; not as to whether the Secretary might grant a permit or the Government grant a title to the land. The Secretary of Agriculture has already granted several permits of this kind for sites for schoolhouses, I understand. People have undoubtedly been compelled to build on a forest reserve because there was no other place and they could only get a permit.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But the committee and the Secretary of Agriculture are not of the same opinion?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Not on this point.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I mean on this point.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. The committee thought that inasmuch as the Secretary several times had given a permit for schoolhouses that showed that there were places where a schoolhouse could be advantageously located in a forest reserve, and if that was so the Government ought not to confine them to a mere permit but ought to give title to the ground. We did not want to compel a school district to build schoolhouses on temporary permits that might be revoked at any time. That was the thought of the committee. If the House wants us to compel the people to build schoolhouses on temporary permits, or if you do not want us to have a schoolhouse on any forest reserve, then strike it out and let us go on with the rest of the bill. That is not a very important or vital part of the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Did the committee give consideration to the question of whether the Interior Department ought to have some discretion as to the particular location of the site which they would grant?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Interior Department is the department that always grants the title to the public land. The Agricultural Department does not grant title to public land. That department only gives permits to run during their good will.

Mr. CRAMTON. Leaving the Department of Agriculture out of it, considering only the granting of sites on the public lands, did the committee give consideration to the question as to whether the department should retain any discretion as to the particular site where the location should be made?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The bill provides that school districts shall have the "right" to purchase so-and-so.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; but does not the bill provide that the Secretary of the Interior shall investigate or exercise his discretion?

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not find anything that leaves any discretion to the Secretary as to the site, where it is to be located. If a school district picks out a certain piece of land and asks for it, regardless of conditions——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have no objection to the Secretary of the Interior being discretionary authority to grant or refuse a site in the sparsely settled portions of the West, but we want to encourage the building of schoolhouses. Are you not in favor of doing that?

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to say to the gentleman that the House is entitled to information. The bill not only must have a good purpose, but it must have such language in it as will subserve that purpose. The bill should be put in proper shape. The gentleman should not be sensitive as to the terminology suggested.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am not a particle sensitive as to terminology. On the contrary, I am saying that if the bill is not correct, let us amend it. Let us not kill a good bill because one provision in it is objectionable to somebody. I had a little bill here myself once, to try to get 5 acres of public land set aside for a schoolhouse, and I had to worry around here for a long time, and the people got tired of waiting and went and bought some private land and built on it, as I recollect. Here is a general bill providing for schools on the public land. A bill of this kind ought to have passed 50 years ago.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the gentleman had that experience, it seems to me it would be wise to pass a bill, without any objection, to let the Secretary of the Interior issue title for schoolhouse sites on the public lands, and not endeavor to steal a march on the forest reserves and locate school buildings nobody knows where in a timbered country and nobody knows for what purpose. Why not take the easy road instead of climbing up a rocky mountain?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They are not going to locate a schoolhouse on the top of a mountain where nobody could go to it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, I do not know about that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They do not spend money for nothing.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know about that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They might without any justification be accused of various things, but no one would ever charge them with throwing their money away in that manner.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, they will beg somebody for the money. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No one should blame people for trying to build schoolhouses wherever there are any children, and fortunately there are children everywhere where there are any people all through the mountains. There can be no objection to authorizing the Secretary to grant a title to a small piece of public land for a schoolhouse. But the only question was as to whether or not we should have a school site of 10 acres of worthless ground on the forest reserve, and we decided that we should. We resolved the doubt in favor of the school, where anybody wants to build one, and we were in favor of giving the school district the land to build on and not make them take a license and occupy the land only during good behavior. There will be very few schoolhouses built on that kind of a foundation.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill remain on the calendar, at the foot.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I object. I think this bill ought to go back to the committee and have a proper report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next one.

LIBRARY INFORMATION SERVICE, BUREAU OF EDUCATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6870) to provide for a library information service in the Bureau of Education.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I doubt very seriously whether this bill ought to be taken up and considered and passed by the 30 or 40 Members that we now have present and which we usually have present under such circumstances. This is an important measure, to my mind. This bill is based almost entirely upon a suggestion made by Miss Edith Guerrier, of the Boston Public Library. I doubt very seriously whether her suggestion is good and should be acted upon. At least it should be thoroughly considered by the House. This bill is going right against the policy suggested by the distinguished floor leader on the other side [Mr. MONDELL], as indicated in the public press, that we were going to begin the process of retrenchment. This measure provides a director at $4,000 a year, and an assistant at $3,000, and a chief clerk at $2,000, and a stenographer at $1,600, and such other employees, not exceeding $8,100 per annum, as the director may want. To my mind the possible good that may be accomplished by this legislation hardly justifies this expenditure and the creation of such new offices.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, is it the gentleman's purpose to object to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I was suggesting the propriety——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman demands the regular order, which stops all discussion, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects. The Clerk will report the next one.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE SUSQUEHANNA RIVER AT LACEYVILLE, PA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8992) for the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at Laceyville, Wyoming County, Pa.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct within the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania a bridge, with approaches thereto, across the Susquehanna River at Laceyville, Wyoming County, Pa., at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The question was taken; and there were 33 ayes and no noes.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

OCHOCO NATIONAL FOREST, OREG.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 348) to add certain land to the Ochoco National Forest, Oreg.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I ask that those who have charge of the bill or made the report advise us as to the necessity for the inclusion of this land in the Ochoco National Forest of Oregon.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, one of the main reasons is that the land in question has upon it some springs which command a grazing area of some 6,000 acres in this Ochoco National Forest. A further reason is that about 1,200 acres of the land is practically a part of the forest reserve now, for the reason that that area is embraced in a stock-driveway withdrawal for the purpose of giving stock a passageway into the forest reserves. If this land is added to the forest reserves, drift fences will be placed on the land, which will prevent stock grazing on the forest reserves from escaping and preventing other loose stock from encroaching on the forest reserves.

Mr. GARD. What is meant by the expression in line 5, page 1, of this bill, "subject to all prior valid adverse rights"? What adverse rights to the incorporation of a national forest reserve are there?

Mr. SINNOTT. Adverse rights would be a homestead application heretofore allowed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. GARD. What adverse rights are there involved here?

Mr. SINNOTT. As a matter of fact, there are none, as I understand. The Secretary of the Interior refers to applications which are suspended, and of course no rights accrue by virtue of a suspended application.

Mr. GARD. The report of the Secretary of the Interior says that some 1,581 acres are enterable under the 320-acre enlarged-homestead law and 480 acres are embraced in the suspended homestead applications, and so forth. These lands have not as yet been classified under said act. Would these reservations be included in prior adverse rights?

Mr. SINNOTT. If any applications had not been allowed by the Secretary of the Interior, it would not be a prior adverse right. If they had been allowed, they would be a prior adverse right.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the character of the lands—are they susceptible to cultivation?

Mr. SINNOTT. The report of the Department of Agriculture states that only about 12 acres of this land is susceptible of cultivation. The rest is wild, broken, and contains some timber which is suitable for forest purposes. The Secretary of Agriculture stated that the main object for taking this land is the springs, to be used in connection with the grazing on the forest reserve.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understood the gentleman to say that only a small area would be susceptible of cultivation?

Mr. SINNOTT. I think the report states about 10 or 12 acres.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 348) to add certain lands to the Ochoco National Forest, Oreg.

Be it enacted, etc., That the following described lands be, and the same are, included in and made a part of the Ochoco National Forest, Oreg., subject to all prior valid adverse rights, and that said lands shall hereafter be subject to all laws affecting national forests: Sections 27 and 34, township 17 south, range 21 east, sections 3 and 10 and the east half of section 9, township 18 south, range 21 east, all of Willamette meridian and base.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 31 ayes and no noes.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CLAIMS OF SIOUX TRIBE OF INDIANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1018) authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, the bill authorizes the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims. Is there anyone representing the bill or anyone from the Committee on Indian Affairs to explain the contents of the bill? It seems to be a comprehensive statement of a new procedure, and I would suggest, in the absence of anyone interested in the bill, that it be passed.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Would the bill go to the foot of the calendar?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not so understand.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask to modify the request for unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice and go to the foot of the calendar.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I accept that suggestion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request as modified?

There was no objection.

RIGHTS OF WAY THROUGH PUBLIC LANDS.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 2946) to amend acts to permit the use of rights of way through the public lands for tramroads, canals, and reservoirs, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman who made the report on this bill what is the necessity for setting aside such a large amount of land for such purposes?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It only proposes to set aside five acres. These canal attendants use horses in connection with their work, and it is necessary that they have a space of ground in which to feed and exercise them and to erect a house and barn and other outbuildings and upon which to store hay.

Mr. WALSH. Where do they exercise them now, and where do they get their hay stored?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I suppose they get some exercise from riding up and down the canals.

Mr. WALSH. Well, it looks to me too much like an attempt to hitch up some grazing proposition with an irrigation project. I do not understand——

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. There is no irrigation. It is not possible to irrigate any of this land which is desired. It is located on the desert, and the only way to get the water to irrigate five acres would be by pumping from the canal, and that would not be possible without a great deal more expense than would be warranted.

Mr. WALSH. Would it not be possible, if they got five acres adjoining one of these ditches or laterals, for them to swing that ditch around into that land?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It might be possible, but not practicable.

Mr. WALSH. Then if he can not grow anything on the land, how can the horses graze on it? Of course the gentleman would not contend——

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman is the one who said that they wanted to graze the horses; I have not said so.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman said nothing can grow on it, as I understood.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It will not without water for irrigation purposes.

Mr. WALSH. And it can not be irrigated?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It can not be irrigated advantageously because of the expense involved in getting the water to it.

Mr. WALSH. And therefore if they can not grow anything there, and it would be so expensive to get water on it, it could not be used very advantageously for grazing for those four or five horses?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; not for grazing.

Mr. WALSH. If that is so, why do they need 5 acres?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. For the simple reason they will probably have a half dozen horses which they use in going up and down the canals, and 5 acres would not be too much on which to exercise five or six horses and give space in which to roam about.

Mr. WALSH. This also permits the erection of dwellings and other buildings. Where are those buildings located now?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The buildings used by the men now are very cheap wooden shacks. The company desires to have this law enacted in order that they may have a permanent site on which to erect comfortable homes costing probably two or three thousand dollars for these ditch riders. Under existing conditions they do not feel warranted in going to such a large expense, and for that reason they desire to have this law enacted.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know how many of these ditch riders there are who are affected by this legislation?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I suppose there are probably 50 people who will be accommodated on the particular project I have in mind in Idaho.

Mr. WALSH. But this applies to all irrigation projects?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. For all irrigation projects, but the land can not be used for any other purpose than the purpose for which it is intended under the proposed law. The bill passed both the House and Senate in the last Congress, but came back from the Senate with a slight amendment, which has been incorporated in the present bill, but it was received too late to receive the Speaker's attention before adjournment.

Mr. WALSH. In view of the gentleman's representations, Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the reservation of the right to object.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I want to direct the attention of the gentleman from Idaho to this language in line 2 of the bill, as to what, in his opinion, is the difference between "permits or easements," and whether there is any advantage in retaining the word "respectively" as asked to be inserted by the Secretary of the Interior on page 2 of the report in which it states that the bill be amended so as to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant "permits or easements, respectively, embracing not to exceed 5 acres," and so forth. Is there any difference in the application that this should be made not to exceed 5 acres in what is called a permit and what is called an easement?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; they are practically synonymous terms. A permit is simply an easement, a revocable authority to use the land.

Mr. GARD. A permit may permit the use of the land, the entire use of the land, and an easement, I suspect, may be limited to some access to and from the land.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Well, they are synonymous terms.

Mr. GARD. Not necessarily.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. They are in this instance. The word "permit" really could be eliminated because it adds nothing and usually applies to lands in the forest reserve, while an easement applies to land on the public domain.

Mr. GARD. This is, of course, an application for land in the public domain?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes. Although, as the bill is drawn, it applies to the forest reserves, I intend to offer an amendment that was suggested by the Secretary of Agriculture after this report was made.

Mr. GARD. What is the amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I propose to offer an amendment at the end of the bill inserting the words:

Provided, That this act shall not apply to lands within national forests.

This was suggested in a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture after the report was made and was entirely gratuitous, but we have no objection to the limitation of the act to the public domain.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman believe that the word "permits," as contained in line 3, should be stricken out?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I do not think it makes any difference whether it is stricken out or left in.

Mr. GARD. I am asking that because I am unfamiliar with the application of the word "permits" or "easements" to these 5 acres of ground that may be granted adjoining rights of way.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I have no objection to eliminating the word "permits." I do not think it makes any difference at all.

Mr. GARD. As suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], there is a very great distinction in the understanding of the law, as we of the States that are not public-land States do not consider that a permit is an easement.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. They are synonymous terms so far as they affect public lands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2946) to amend acts to permit the use of the right of way through the public lands for tramroads, canals, and reservoirs, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That in addition to the rights of way granted by sections 18, 19, 20, and 21 of the act of Congress entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891 (26 Stats., p. 1095), as amended by the act of Congress entitled "An act to amend the irrigation act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stats., p. 1095, sec. 18), and to amend section 2 of the act of May 11, 1898 (30 Stats., p. 404)," approved March 4, 1917 (39 Stats., p. 1197), and, subject to the conditions and restrictions therein contained, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to grant permits or easements for not to exceed 5 acres of ground adjoining the right of way at each of the locations, to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, to be used for the erection thereon of dwellings or other buildings or corrals for the convenience of those engaged in the care and management of the works provided for by said acts.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, page 2, line 3, strike out the words "permits or."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GARD: Page -2, line 3, strike out the words "permits or."

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Ohio seems to be anxious to follow the recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior in matters of legislation of this character, I suggest that the Secretary use the term "grants, permits, or easements," and it seems to me that unless there is some good reason for opposing the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior in the matter——

Mr. GARD. I am not following the Secretary of the Interior or anybody else. I am asking a question of the gentleman, who I suspect knows all about these public-land bills. I am sure that he knows more than I do, because he is from a State where he has grown familiar with them. The bill itself is an act to permit the use of the right of way through public lands for tramroads, canals, and reservoirs, and so forth, and it refers all along to rights of way, and an easement in the ordinary acceptation of legal phrases is recognized as a right of way, while a permit may be an absolute grant to use the land, not for access or not for a particular purpose or any purpose at all. The word "permit" is so broad that I suggest, in the interest of the real meaning of the legislation, which is an act to grant the use of the right of way through public lands, it be confined to the right of way, if that is what it means.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. DEWALT. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that an easement is actually a right in property, and is really a hereditament and has a permanency of character which could not be taken from the grantee by the act of the grantor, and could not be taken except by the acts of both being willing to do so after it was granted, whereas a permit is revokable at the option of the party who grants the provision. "Easement" is a much stronger word than "permit," and it may be that it is the idea of the Secretary of the Interior to grant only a limited permit, which may be revoked at any time by the department, whereas if the easement is granted it becomes permanent in its nature; it becomes a hereditament under the law.

Mr. GARD. It was for that that I was asking questions from the gentleman from Idaho, because I wanted to understand as to what the law was to carry. I do not know what the understanding of those who have charge of this legislation is. It does not seem to me to be very material, but if it is I want it amended.

Mr. SINNOTT. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman's first interpretation of the word "permit" and the distinction between a permit and an easement, and it seems to me that the word "permit" should be retained there and not eliminated. I agree with the gentleman's first interpretation. For that reason I prefer to see the amendment withdrawn.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman, from his understanding of the language in the bill and the circumstances to which the bill applies, believe that the word "permit" is a word proper to use in connection with this grant? If it is, I have no objection to its being used.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; I think so.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, then I withdraw the proposed amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio withdraws the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, on the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, who has volunteered the suggestion, I offer an amendment at the end of the bill:

Provided, That this act shall not apply to lands within national forests.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Idaho offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Idaho moves to amend by inserting at the end of the bill the following proviso: "Provided, That this act shall not apply to lands within national forests."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 0.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Idaho, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

WATER SUPPLY ON RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 796) for furnishing water supply for miscellaneous purposes in connection with reclamation projects.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the bill go to the foot of the calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

TRANSFER OF EMPLOYEES IN CLASSIFIED CIVIL SERVICE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 7404) to repeal section 7 of the act of October 7, 1917, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes."

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] if the passage of this measure, repealing this section of the deficiency bill, would not materially interfere with the reduction of the number of employees now here in the city of Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; I do not think so. I know of no reason why it should.

Mr. WALSH. It certainly would not aid in that direction, would it?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I do not know that it would have any particular effect.

Mr. WALSH. That being so, Mr. Speaker, rather than pass any legislation affecting these vast numbers, running up into many thousands of employees now in Washington, who came here as the result of the war emergency——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad to see that the gentleman is so careful about that point, but rather than refrain from passing legislation that will permit them to stay here, would it not be better, I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, that we should pass some legislation that would eliminate them from the Government pay roll and send them home? There are about 40,000 of them, and they ought to be sent home.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Texas has introduced a bill to that effect, but I notice it has not reached the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. I will say to the gentleman that I am going to watch the appropriation bills when they come in.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I have no personal interest in this legislation, but it has been recommended by the president of the Civil Service Commission and also by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War, and I understand that other Cabinet officers believe that the enactment of this legislation would be helpful in the conduct of the public business. It seems to me that unless there is some reason which has not yet been advanced why the legislation should not be enacted, it should be allowed to be taken up for consideration.

Mr. WALSH. This measure will permit the transfer of employees from one department to another department at an increased rate of compensation?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. If paid from lump-sum appropriations; and the gentleman appreciates the fact that there are a large number of departments that are still operating upon lump-sum appropriations, and will continue to operate for some little time under them, probably beyond the end of this fiscal year. Now, this was enacted, it is true, as emergency legislation, but even though the emergency is over, these lump-sum appropriations are still available. Does the gentleman think we ought to permit, and by passing this legislation even encourage, these transfers in lieu of promotions?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. We should encourage transfers where it is shown that the public service would be benefited.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. WALSH. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

ADDITIONS TO THE CARIBOU NATIONAL FOREST.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4311) to authorize the addition of certain land to the Caribou National Forest.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, this is another bill authorizing an addition of certain lands to the national forest reserves, seemingly for a very large amount of land. I would be very glad to have some information as to the necessity for the enactment of this law.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, the strip of land which it is proposed to add to the Caribou National Forest in Idaho is near the top of a mountain range and lies between two national forests, one in Wyoming and the other in the State of Idaho. The land can not be utilized for agricultural purposes, but is used to some extent for grazing purposes. This legislation is simply following out the policy of the Agricultural Department to place within national forest reserves such public lands as are only valuable for timber or for the conservation of stream supply.

Mr. GARD. Can I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I notice in the letter of Mr. Ousley, the Acting Secretary of the Department of Agriculture, that he suggests that the present bill should be amended by adding at the end of line 5, on page 1, the words "or regulation and improvement of the grazing thereon."

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. There is no objection to the amendment; but it is not really necessary, because after the land is once taken into the national forest grazing is regulated by the department.

Mr. ANDERSON. The trouble with that is that the Secretary could not embrace within the forest reserve, under this authorization, lands that might be contiguous and desirable from the standpoint of grazing for regulation, because the language is not broad enough to cover in the reservation grazing land.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman think that this language should be added, "or regulation and improvement of the grazing thereon"?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think so.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. GARD. Is there a proposition to amend the bill in any other way?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; except as shown in the bill. The committee amendments are printed in italics.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman has no objection to the amendment I have suggested being adopted?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any lands within the following-described areas, found by the Secretary of Agriculture to be chiefly valuable for the production of timber or the protection of stream flow, may be included within and made a part of the Caribou National Forest by proclamation of the President, said lands to be thereafter subject to all laws affecting national forests: Sections 26 and 27, township 9 south, range 46 east, Boise meridian; northwest quarter of section 1, all of section 2, east half of section 12, all of sections 13, 23, 24, 25, 26, 35, and 36, township 10 south, range 45 east, Boise meridian; all of sections 6, 7, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, and 35, township 10 south, range 46 east, Boise meridian, unsurveyed; all of sections 1, 2, 11, 12, 13, 14, east half of section 23, all of 24, 25, and 36, township 11 south, range 45 east, Boise meridian; all of unsurveyed township 11 south, range 46 east, Boise meridian; all of section 36, township 12 south, range 45 east, Boise meridian; all of sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 29, 30, 31, 32, of township 12 south, range 46 east, Boise meridian, partly unsurveyed; all of sections 5 and 6, and north half of section 7, and north half of section 8, township 13 south, range 46 east, Boise meridian.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "may," insert the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

Page 1, line 7, after the word "forest," insert a comma and the word "Idaho" followed by a comma.

Page 2, line 18, change the period, after the word "meridian," to a semicolon and add: "Provided, That all lands embraced in any lawful application or entry pending at the date of the approval of this act be, and the same are hereby, excluded from the provisions of this act."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment at the end of line 5, page 1: Add the words "or regulation for improvement in the grazing thereon."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 1, line 5, at the end of the line insert the words "or regulation for improvement of the grazing thereon."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a demand for a division by Mr. BLANTON there were 38 ayes and 1 no.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Idaho, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

READJUSTMENT OF CONTRACT FOR SALE OF OLD POST-OFFICE PROPERTY IN NEW HAVEN, CONN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9183) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the terms of the contract for the sale of the old post-office property in New Haven, Conn.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman what is the trouble with the contract that it needs adjusting?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, as shown in the report accompanying this bill filed by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS], Congress authorized in 1910 the construction of a new Federal building in New Haven. In February, 1917, the new building was so nearly completed that it was believed to be in the interest of the United States to make a contract of sale of the old property. At that time it appeared that the new building would be ready for occupancy within a year. In fact, it was thought that there would be no difficulty in finishing the new building in time to give possession of the old property within a year.

A contract of sale was made by which an advance cash payment was to be made and the balance in yearly installments, with interest on the installments; but bear in mind that delivery of possession was expected to be made within one year.

The war came to us in April, 1917. Soon thereafter, with the consent of the Treasury Department, work was suspended on the new building, so that it was not completed and ready for occupancy until August, 1919. Therefore delivery of possession of the old property could not be made in March, 1918, as it was originally expected by both the purchasers and the Government. Therefore there is a loss of interest on the advance payment for almost a year and a half, besides interest paid by purchasers on deferred installments. It might be stated the other way around, too—the loss of the use of the property by the purchasers for a year and a half. The Secretary of the Treasury very properly proposes to measure that use by the interest, and the purchasers are entirely willing. There seems to be entire agreement between the Secretary of the Treasury and the purchasers as to what will be a fair adjustment of the contract.

Mr. CONNALLY. In other words, the Government will not lose anything except to offset the rent against the interest.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman is correct. It would be done by private parties without any difficulty, but it seems that the Government can not do it without additional legislation. The sole purpose of this bill is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make a fair and equitable adjustment of a contract which has become unfair and inequitable by reason of circumstances over which the purchasers, at any rate, had no control.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not make any objection.

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, how much is the amount of interest involved?

Mr. TILSON. As shown in the report, $25,519.29.

Mr. GARD. That is what is described as the net credit to the purchaser's account?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. GARD. The possession of the building was given to the purchaser on August 12, 1919. When was it proposed to be given under the agreement.

Mr. TILSON. The contract was made February 27, 1917, and it was expected that possession would be delivered on March 21, 1918, as I now recall the dates. The war came on and disarranged matters.

Mr. GARD. Does this readjustment meet with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. TILSON. It does. The gentleman will note in the report that Secretary Glass sends a letter and recommends this as a fair adjustment of the contract.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in his discretion and with the consent of the contractors, to modify and readjust the terms of the contract for the sale of the old post-office property in New Haven, Conn., entered into March 13, 1917, in such manner as he may deem equitable and just, if he shall determine that said contract has become inequitable and unjust on account of the unforeseen conditions arising since its execution, with respect to the Government's failure to deliver the property as soon as expected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 32, noes 0.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

STANDARD OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9755) to establish a standard of weights and measures for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be placed at the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit it to go to the foot of the calendar?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SALARIES OF UNITED STATES MARSHAL AND OTHERS IN LOUISIANA.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 597) providing for an increase of salary for the United States marshal and district attorney for the western district and for the United States district attorney for the eastern district of Louisiana.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman please reserve his objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think not; I am going to object in any event.

Mr. WATKINS. I will be glad of an opportunity to explain the reason why it should be considered.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

ADDITIONS TO OREGON, SIUSLAW, AND CRATER NATIONAL FORESTS, OREG.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8028) to reserve as parts of the Oregon, Siuslaw, and Crater National Forests in Oregon certain lands that were revested in the United States pursuant to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Oregon & California Railroad Co. against the United States.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the bill seems to be a very comprehensive one. I have not been able to read the report very closely. I would be glad to have those interested explain the bill, if there is necessity for its enactment at this time.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill is practically the same as the one pending during the last Congress. There has been added to it the provision for the protection of the water supply of the city of Ashland. These lands are those that were recovered from the Oregon & California Railroad Co., and they are essential to the protection of the water supply of the several cities named. The four towns named have no source of water supply other than the sources now used by them. If the lands are logged over and the areas burnt thereafter, as they undoubtedly would be sooner or later, and the forest cover destroyed, the waters falling on those mountain ranges will quickly run off and not be absorbed by the soil and by the forest cover, and for a considerable period every summer these towns will be without a sufficient water supply. The land is not transferred out of the possession of the United States. It is transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture. The Secretary of the Interior sees no objection to the transfer and thinks that the timber, where it will not injure the water supply and its preservation, can be cut and removed under the jurisdiction of the Forest Service, and the Secretary of Agriculture approves that recommendation. The amount transferred in comparison to the total grant is not large; something like 8,400 acres.

Mr. GARD. Is it intended to use this additional forest reserve for the new water supply for Oregon City, Dallas, Corvallis, and Ashland?

Mr. HAWLEY. These four towns have already constructed their pipe lines to the localities where these lands lie. They are part of the areas from which they are now deriving their water supply.

Mr. GARD. What relation do these lands revested in the United States have to the water supply of those four towns?

Mr. HAWLEY. The towns are already getting their water in part from these lands. The pipe lines run out to other lands just adjoining. If these lands are reserved they will, with others now used by the cities, make an area which will be probably sufficient to provide the necessary water supplies the year around.

Mr. GARD. Is there at this time a failure of the water supply of those cities?

Mr. HAWLEY. The city of Corvallis had to limit its citizens in the domestic use of water for the last two seasons, and they could not be used for irrigation purposes at all during part of the summer seasons.

Mr. GARD. There was a bill before the House, I recall, providing for the relief of Corvallis.

Mr. HAWLEY. This is the same bill, with the addition of the town of Ashland, which was before the last Congress.

Mr. GARD. Was not a bill providing for a water supply for Corvallis passed by the Congress?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; it did not pass. A bill relating to the water supply of McMinnville was passed by the House, but not for the cities named in this bill. There has never been any relief granted to them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none?

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That such portions of the lands hereinafter described as shall be deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture for the conservation and protection of the water supplies of the cities of Oregon City, Dallas, Corvallis, and Ashland, Oreg., and which are within the limits of the grant by the United States to the Oregon & California Railroad Co., that were revested in the United States pursuant to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Oregon & California Railroad Co. v. The United States (238 U. S. Stats., p. 393), and an act of Congress approved June 9, 1916, be, and the same are hereby, reserved and set aside as parts of the Oregon, Siuslaw, and Crater National Forests, as follows:

As part of the Oregon National Forest, south and east of the Willamette meridian, Oregon:

Township 5 south, range 4 east, section 1, all; section 11, all; section 13, all; section 15, north half southeast quarter, southwest quarter and north half; section 23, all; section 25, all; township 4 south, range 5 east, section 19, all; section 27, northeast quarter; section 29, northwest quarter northwest quarter; south half northwest quarter; and south half northeast quarter; section 31, all; section 35, east half, for the protection of the water supply of Oregon City, Oreg.

As part of the Siuslaw National Forest, south and west of the Willamette meridian, Oregon:

Township 7 south, range 6 west, section 21, northeast quarter southeast quarter, west half southeast quarter, and southwest quarter; section 29, northeast quarter and south one-half; section 33, north half northeast quarter, northwest quarter and southeast quarter, for the protection of the water supply of Dallas, Oreg.

Township 39 south, range 1 east, section 19, east one-half; section 21, east one-half of west one-half and east one-half, for the protection of the water supply of Ashland, Oreg.

SEC. 2. The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 3.

So the bill was passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to add to the Oregon, Siuslaw, and Crater National Forests in Oregon certain lands that were revested in the United States pursuant to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Oregon & California Railroad Co. v. The United States, and for other purposes."

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FEDERAL OFFICE BUILDING AT ST. LOUIS, MO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 484) to provide for the erection of a Federal office building on the site acquired for the Subtreasury in St. Louis, Mo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. GARD. I object.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] intend to object finally after any statement is made that may clear up any doubt?

Mr. GARD. The reason I object is that I do not see any submission to the Treasury Department for any recommendation as to the proposed measure.

Mr. DYER. That has been done. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if we are going to waste any time on it, I object.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I hope the gentleman will reserve his objection. I want to offer an explanation in regard to it.

Mr. BLANTON. Are we not withdrawing the Subtreasuries rather than extending them? I thought the policy of our Government was to draw them in.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. This does draw in. If the gentleman will reserve his objection and let me explain——

Mr. BLANTON. I think there are as many as seven men on the floor who will object, and what is the use of wasting time?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I think they will not object when they see that there is no appropriation required, and when we are obliged now to furnish space at $28,000 a year.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time, I object.

ARMY MEDICAL SUPPLIES FOR AMERICAN RED CROSS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution 176, providing for placing certain surplus Army medical supplies at the disposal of the American Red Cross.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

REPAYMENT OF COMMISSIONS, ETC., UNDER PUBLIC-LAND LAWS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2129) to amend an act approved March 26, 1908, entitled "An act to provide for the repayment of certain commissions, excess payments, and purchase moneys paid under the public-land laws."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman withhold objection for a moment, so that I can make a very brief explanation?

Mr. GARD. I will.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced at the request of the Secretary of the Interior. The only change it makes in the present law is to require an applicant to file his application within two years for a return of any excess payment or payment on rejection of entry or proof. Sections 1 and 2 of the bill look quite formidable, but they are merely a reenactment of the present law, with the addition of the provisos. Now, section 1, down to line 8, on page 2—down to the proviso on that page—is the present law. And the proviso puts on a statute of limitations requiring the applicant to present his application for a repayment within two years. At the present time he has the right under the first part of section 1 of this bill, which is the present law, to put in his application for a return payment, with no time limit. They are putting in applications in the Interior Department to-day for payments that were made 30 years ago. Attorneys are gleaning over the records of the Interior Department and ascertaining what excess payments were made 30 and 40 years ago, and are presenting applications for repayment and for a refund to the Secretary of the Interior; and all that this bill does is to put a statute of limitations to require applicants within two years to present their applications, and not let them have 50 or 100 years. It seems to me this is a bill that should be enacted into law for the protection of the Treasury. Otherwise, these men can have 50 years to demand these repayments. And bear in mind that the first part of section 1, down to the proviso, and the first part of section 2, down to the proviso, are merely the present law, and the proviso adds on the statute of limitation, and that is the only difference between the bill and the present law, with the exception of section 4, which authorizes the Secretary to make the rules and regulations. This bill was introduced by the chairman of the Senate committee at the request of the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior sent to me a similar request. I introduced the bill, but the Senate bill having been first acted upon, the House committee took up the Senate bill.

Mr. GARD. Would not the bill meet the purpose of the gentleman if he would strike out the proviso and leave this section 4?

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, no. Then, you would not have any statute of limitations. They would still have eternity in which to present claims.

Mr. GARD. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make rules to carry out the provisions of the act.

Mr. SINNOTT. To carry out the provisions of the act, and the act gives them for all time to present their claims to the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior could not enact legislation limiting the period within which they could put in their claims.

Mr. GARD. I would like to know whether the matter before the department might not be so continuous that the limitation of two years would be too narrow a limitation?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; I think that is an ample limitation. It is the same limitation as is placed upon the Government in issuing a patent. The Government has to issue a patent within two years unless there is some adverse proceeding taken. I certainly can see no objection. It is a protection to the Treasury.

Mr. GARD. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. SINNOTT. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act approved March 26, 1908 (35 Stat. L., p. 48), entitled "An act to provide for the repayment of certain commissions, excess payments, and purchase moneys paid under the public land laws," be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1. That where purchase moneys and commissions paid under any public land law have been or shall hereafter be covered into the Treasury of the United States under any application to make any filing, location, selection, entry, or proof, such purchase moneys and commissions shall be repaid to the person who made such application, entry, or proof, or to his legal representatives, in all cases where such application, entry, or proof has been or shall hereafter be rejected, and neither such applicant nor his legal representatives shall have been guilty of any fraud or attempted fraud in connection with such application: Provided, That such person or his legal representatives shall file a request for the repayment of such purchase moneys and commissions within two years from the rejection of such application, entry, or proof, or within two years from the passage of this act as to such applications, proofs, or entries, as have been heretofore rejected.

"SEC. 2. That in all cases where it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that any person has heretofore or shall hereafter make any payments to the United States under the public land laws in excess of the amount he was lawfully required to pay under such laws, such excess shall be repaid to such person or to his legal representatives: Provided, That such person or his legal representatives shall file a request for the repayment of such excess within two years after the patent has issued for the land embraced in such payment, or within two years from the passage of this act as to such excess payments as have heretofore been made.

"SEC. 3. That when the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall ascertain the amount of any excess moneys, purchase moneys, or commissions in any case where repayment is authorized by this statute, the Secretary of the Interior shall at once certify such amounts to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized and directed to make repayment of all amounts so certified out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated and issue his warrant in settlement thereof.

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 3.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. Sharkey, one of the secretaries of the President of the United States, appeared and said:

Mr. President, the President of the United States directs me to deliver to the Senate a message in writing.

The message was received by the Secretary of the Senate and handed to the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States.

The Assistant Secretary (Henry M. Rose) read the message, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I sincerely regret that I cannot be present at the opening of this session of the Congress. I am thus prevented from presenting in as direct a way as I could wish the many questions that are pressing for solution at this time. Happily, I have had the advantage of the advice of the heads of the several executive departments who have kept in close touch with affairs in their detail and whose thoughtful recommendations I earnestly second.

In the matter of the railroads and the readjustment of their affairs growing out of federal control, I shall take the liberty at a later date of addressing you.

I hope that Congress will bring to a conclusion at this session legislation looking to the establishment of a budget system. That there should be one single authority responsible for the making of all appropriations and that appropriations should be made not independently of each other, but with reference to one single comprehensive plan of expenditure properly related to the nation's income, there can be no doubt. I believe the burden of preparing the budget must, in the nature of the case, if the work is to be properly done and responsibility concentrated instead of divided, rest upon the executive. The budget so prepared should be submitted to and approved or amended by a single committee of each House of Congress and no single appropriation should be made by the Congress, except such as may have been included in the budget prepared by the executive or added by the particular committee of Congress charged with the budget legislation.

Another and not less important aspect of the problem is the ascertainment of the economy and efficiency with which the moneys appropriated are expended. Under existing law the only audit is for the purpose of ascertaining whether expenditures have been lawfully made within the appropriations. No one is authorized or equipped to ascertain whether the money has been spent wisely, economically and effectively. The auditors should be highly trained officials with permanent tenure in the Treasury Department, free of obligations to or motives of consideration for this or any subsequent administration, and authorized and empowered to examine into and make report upon the methods employed and the results obtained by the executive departments of the Government. Their reports should be made to the Congress and to the Secretary of the Treasury.

I trust that the Congress will give its immediate consideration to the problem of future taxation. Simplification of the income and profits taxes has become an immediate necessity. These taxes performed indispensable service during the war. They must, however, be simplified, not only to save the taxpayer inconvenience and expense, but in order that his liability may be made certain and definite.

With reference to the details of the Revenue Law, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will lay before you for your consideration certain amendments necessary or desirable in connection with the administration of the law—recommendations which have my approval and support. It is of the utmost importance that in dealing with this matter the present law should not be disturbed so far as regards taxes for the calendar year 1920, payable in the calendar year 1921. The Congress might well consider whether the higher rates of income and profits taxes can in peace times be effectively productive of revenue, and whether they may not, on the contrary, be destructive of business activity and productive of waste and inefficiency. There is a point at which in peace times high rates of income and profits taxes discourage energy, remove the incentive to new enterprise, encourage extravagant expenditures and produce industrial stagnation with consequent unemployment and other attendant evils.

The problem is not an easy one. A fundamental change has taken place with reference to the position of America in the world's affairs. The prejudice and passions engendered by decades of controversy between two schools of political and economic thought,—the one believers in protection of American industries, the other believers in tariff for revenue only,—must be subordinated to the single consideration of the public interest in the light of utterly changed conditions. Before the war America was heavily the debtor of the rest of the world and the interest payments she had to make to foreign countries on American securities held abroad, the expenditures of American travelers abroad and the ocean freight charges she had to pay to others, about balanced the value of her pre-war favorable balance of trade. During the war America's exports have been greatly stimulated, and increased prices have increased their value. On the other hand, she has purchased a large proportion of the American securities previously held abroad, has loaned some $9,000,000,000 to foreign governments, and has built her own ships. Our favorable balance of trade has thus been greatly increased and Europe has been deprived of the means of meeting it heretofore existing. Europe can have only three ways of meeting the favorable balance of trade in peace times: by imports into this country of gold or of goods, or by establishing new credits. Europe is in no position at the present time to ship gold to us nor could we contemplate large further imports of gold into this country without concern. The time has nearly passed for international governmental loans and it will take time to develop in this country a market for foreign securities. Anything, therefore, which would tend to prevent foreign countries from settling for our exports by shipments of goods into this country could only have the effect of preventing them from paying for our exports and therefore of preventing the exports from being made. The productivity of the country greatly stimulated by the war must find an outlet by exports to foreign countries and any measures taken to prevent imports will inevitably curtail exports, force curtailment of production, load the banking machinery of the country with credits to carry unsold products and produce industrial stagnation and unemployment. If we want to sell, we must be prepared to buy. Whatever, therefore, may have been our views during the period of growth of American business concerning tariff legislation, we must now adjust our own economic life to a changed condition growing out of the fact that American business is full grown and that America is the greatest capitalist in the world.

No policy of isolation will satisfy the growing needs and opportunities of America. The provincial standards and policies of the past, which have held American business as if in a strait-jacket, must yield and give way to the needs and exigencies of the new day in which we live, a day full of hope and promise for American business, if we will but take advantage of the opportunities that are ours for the asking. The recent war has ended our isolation and thrown upon us a great duty and responsibility. The United States must share the expanding world market. The United States desires for itself only equal opportunity with the other nations of the world, and that through the process of friendly cooperation and fair competition the legitimate interests of the nations concerned may be successfully and equitably adjusted.

There are other matters of importance upon which I urged action at the last session of Congress which are still pressing for solution. I am sure it is not necessary for me again to remind you that there is one immediate and very practicable question resulting from the war which we should meet in the most liberal spirit. It is a matter of recognition and relief to our soldiers. I can do no better than to quote from my last message urging this very action:

"We must see to it that our returning soldiers are assisted in every practicable way to find the places for which they are fitted in the daily work of the country. This can be done by developing and maintaining upon an adequate scale the admirable organization created by the Department of Labor for placing men seeking work; and it can also be done, in at least one very great field, by creating new opportunities for individual enterprise. The Secretary of the Interior has pointed out the way by which returning soldiers may be helped to find and take up land in the hitherto undeveloped regions of the country which the Federal Government has already prepared or can readily prepare for cultivation and also on many of the cutover or neglected areas which lie within the limits of the older states; and I once more take the liberty of recommending very urgently that his plans shall receive the immediate and substantial support of the Congress."

In the matter of tariff legislation, I beg to call your attention to the statements contained in my last message urging legislation with reference to the establishment of the chemical and dyestuffs industry in America:

"Among the industries to which special consideration should be given is that of the manufacture of dyestuffs and related chemicals. Our complete dependence upon German supplies before the war made the interruption of trade a cause of exceptional economic disturbance. The close relation between the manufacture of dyestuffs, on the one hand, and of explosives and poisonous gases, on the other, moreover, has given the industry an exceptional significance and value. Although the United States will gladly and unhesitatingly join in the programme of international disarmament, it will, nevertheless, be a policy of obvious prudence to make certain of the successful maintenance of many strong and well-equipped chemical plants. The German chemical industry, with which we will be brought into competition, was and may well be again, a thoroughly knit monopoly capable of exercising a competition of a peculiarly insidious and dangerous kind."

During the war the farmer performed a vital and willing service to the nation. By materially increasing the production of his land, he supplied America and the Allies with the increased amounts of food necessary to keep their immense armies in the field. He indispensably helped to win the war. But there is now scarcely less need of increasing the production in food and the necessaries of life. I ask the Congress to consider means of encouraging effort along these lines. The importance of doing everything possible to promote production along economical lines, to improve marketing, and to make rural life more attractive and healthful, is obvious. I would urge approval of the plans already proposed to the Congress by the Secretary of Agriculture, to secure the essential facts required for the proper study of this question, through the proposed enlarged programmes for farm management studies and crop estimates. I would urge, also, the continuance of federal participation in the building of good roads, under the terms of existing law and under the direction of present agencies; the need of further action on the part of the States and the Federal Government to preserve and develop our forest resources, especially through the practice of better forestry methods on private holdings and the extension of the publicly owned forests; better support for country schools and the more definite direction of their courses of study along lines related to rural problems; and fuller provision for sanitation in rural districts and the building up of needed hospital and medical facilities in these localities. Perhaps the way might be cleared for many of these desirable reforms by a fresh, comprehensive survey made of rural conditions by a conference composed of representatives of the farmers and of the agricultural agencies responsible for leadership.

I would call your attention to the widespread condition of political restlessness in our body politic. The causes of this unrest, while various and complicated, are superficial rather than deep seated. Broadly, they arise from or are connected with the failure on the part of our Government to arrive speedily at a just and permanent peace permitting return to normal conditions, from the transfusion of radical theories from seething European centers pending such delay, from heartless profiteering resulting in the increase of the cost of living, and lastly from the machinations of passionate and malevolent agitators. With the return to normal conditions, this unrest will rapidly disappear. In the meantime, it does much evil. It seems to me that in dealing with this situation Congress should not be impatient or drastic but should seek rather to remove the causes. It should endeavor to bring our country back speedily to a peace basis, with ameliorated living conditions under the minimum of restrictions upon personal liberty that is consistent with our reconstruction problems. And it should arm the Federal Government with power to deal in its criminal courts with those persons who by violent methods would abrogate our time-tested institutions. With the free expression of opinion and with the advocacy of orderly political change, however fundamental, there must be no interference, but towards passion and malevolence tending to incite crime and insurrection under guise of political evolution there should be no leniency. Legislation to this end has been recommended by the Attorney General and should be enacted. In this direct connection, I would call your attention to my recommendations on August 8th, pointing out legislative measures which would be effective in controlling and bringing down the present cost of living, which contributes so largely to this unrest. On only one of these recommendations has the Congress acted. If the Government's campaign is to be effective, it is necessary that the other steps suggested should be acted on at once.

I renew and strongly urge the necessity of the extension of the present Food Control Act as to the period of time in which it shall remain in operation. The Attorney General has submitted a bill providing for an extension of this Act for a period of six months. As it now stands it is limited in operation to the period of the war and becomes inoperative upon the formal proclamation of peace. It is imperative that it should be extended at once. The Department of Justice has built up extensive machinery for the purpose of enforcing its provisions; all of which must be abandoned upon the conclusion of peace unless the provisions of this Act are extended.

During this period the Congress will have an opportunity to make similar, permanent provisions and regulations with regard to all goods destined for interstate commerce and to exclude them from interstate shipment, if the requirements of the law are not complied with. Some such regulation is imperatively necessary. The abuses that have grown up in the manipulation of prices by the withholding of foodstuffs and other necessaries of life cannot otherwise be effectively prevented. There can be no doubt of either the necessity or the legitimacy of such measures.

As I pointed out in my last message, publicity can accomplish a great deal in this campaign. The aims of the Government must be clearly brought to the attention of the consuming public, civic organizations and state officials, who are in a position to lend their assistance to our efforts. You have made available funds with which to carry on this campaign, but there is no provision in the law authorizing their expenditure for the purpose of making the public fully informed about the efforts of the Government. Specific recommendation has been made by the Attorney General in this regard. I would strongly urge upon you its immediate adoption, as it constitutes one of the preliminary steps to this campaign.

I also renew my recommendation that the Congress pass a law regulating cold storage as it is regulated, for example, by the laws of the State of New Jersey, which limit the time during which goods may be kept in storage, prescribe the method of disposing of them if kept beyond the permitted period, and require that goods released from storage shall in all cases bear the date of their receipt. It would materially add to the serviceability of the law, for the purpose we now have in view, if it were also prescribed that all goods released from storage for interstate shipment should have plainly marked upon each package the selling or market price at which they went into storage. By this means the purchaser would always be able to learn what profits stood between him and the producer or the wholesale dealer.

I would also renew my recommendation that all goods destined for interstate commerce should in every case, where their form or package makes it possible, be plainly marked with the price at which they left the hands of the producer.

We should formulate a law requiring a federal license of all corporations engaged in interstate commerce and embodying in the license, or in the conditions under which it is to be issued, specific regulations designed to secure competitive selling and prevent unconscionable profits in the method of marketing. Such a law would afford a welcome opportunity to effect other much needed reforms in the business of interstate shipment and in the methods of corporations which are engaged in it; but for the moment I confine my recommendations to the object immediately in hand, which is to lower the cost of living.

No one who has observed the march of events in the last year can fail to note the absolute need of a definite programme to bring about an improvement in the conditions of labor. There can be no settled conditions leading to increased production and a reduction in the cost of living if labor and capital are to be antagonists instead of partners. Sound thinking and an honest desire to serve the interests of the whole nation, as distinguished from the interests of a class, must be applied to the solution of this great and pressing problem. The failure of other nations to consider this matter in a vigorous way has produced bitterness and jealousies and antagonisms, the food of radicalism. The only way to keep men from agitating against grievances is to remove the grievances. An unwillingness even to discuss these matters produces only dissatisfaction and gives comfort to the extreme elements in our country which endeavor to stir up disturbances in order to provoke governments to embark upon a course of retaliation and repression. The seed of revolution is repression. The remedy for these things must not be negative in character. It must be constructive. It must comprehend the general interest. The real antidote for the unrest which manifests itself is not suppression, but a deep consideration of the wrongs that beset our national life and the application of a remedy.

Congress has already shown its willingness to deal with these industrial wrongs by establishing the eight-hour day as the standard in every field of labor. It has sought to find a way to prevent child labor. It has served the whole country by leading the way in developing the means of preserving and safeguarding lives and health in dangerous industries. It must now help in the difficult task of finding a method that will bring about a genuine democratization of industry, based upon the full recognition of the right of those who work, in whatever rank, to participate in some organic way in every decision which directly affects their welfare. It is with this purpose in mind that I called a conference to meet in Washington on December 1st, to consider these problems in all their broad aspects, with the idea of bringing about a better understanding between these two interests.

The great unrest throughout the world, out of which has emerged a demand for an immediate consideration of the difficulties between capital and labor, bids us put our own house in order. Frankly, there can be no permanent and lasting settlements between capital and labor which do not recognize the fundamental concepts for which labor has been struggling through the years. The whole world gave its recognition and endorsement to these fundamental purposes in the League of Nations. The statesmen gathered at Versailles recognized the fact that world stability could not be had by reverting to industrial standards and conditions against which the average workman of the world had revolted. It is, therefore, the task of the statesmen of this new day of change and readjustment to recognize world conditions and to seek to bring about, through legislation, conditions that will mean the ending of age-long antagonisms between capital and labor and that will hopefully lead to the building up of a comradeship which will result not only in greater contentment among the mass of workmen but also bring about a greater production and a greater prosperity to business itself.

To analyze the particulars in the demands of labor is to admit the justice of their complaint in many matters that lie at their basis. The workman demands an adequate wage, sufficient to permit him to live in comfort, unhampered by the fear of poverty and want in his old age. He demands the right to live and the right to work amidst sanitary surroundings, both in home and in workshop, surroundings that develop and do not retard his own health and well-being; and the right to provide for his children's wants in the matter of health and education. In other words, it is his desire to make the conditions of his life and the lives of those dear to him tolerable and easy to bear.

The establishment of the principles regarding labor laid down in the covenant of the League of Nations offers us the way to industrial peace and conciliation. No other road lies open to us. Not to pursue this one is longer to invite enmities, bitterness, and antagonisms which in the end only lead to industrial and social disaster. The unwilling workman is not a profitable servant. An employee whose industrial life is hedged about by hard and unjust conditions, which he did not create and over which he has no control, lacks that fine spirit of enthusiasm and volunteer effort which are the necessary ingredients of a great producing entity. Let us be frank about this solemn matter. The evidences of world-wide unrest which manifest themselves in violence throughout the world bid us pause and consider the means to be found to stop the spread of this contagious thing before it saps the very vitality of the nation itself. Do we gain strength by withholding the remedy? Or is it not the business of statesmen to treat these manifestations of unrest which meet us on every hand as evidences of an economic disorder and to apply constructive remedies wherever necessary, being sure that in the application of the remedy we touch not the vital tissues of our industrial and economic life? There can be no recession of the tide of unrest until constructive instrumentalities are set up to stem that tide.

Governments must recognize the right of men collectively to bargain for humane objects that have at their base the mutual protection and welfare of those engaged in all industries. Labor must not be longer treated as a commodity. It must be regarded as the activity of human beings, possessed of deep yearnings and desires. The business man gives his best thought to the repair and replenishment of his machinery, so that its usefulness will not be impaired and its power to produce may always be at its height and kept in full vigor and motion. No less regard ought to be paid to the human machine, which after all propels the machinery of the world and is the great dynamic force that lies back of all industry and progress. Return to the old standards of wage and industry in employment is unthinkable. The terrible tragedy of war which has just ended and which has brought the world to the verge of chaos and disaster would be in vain if there should ensue a return to the conditions of the past. Europe itself, whence has come the unrest which now holds the world at bay, is an example of standpatism in these vital human matters which America might well accept as an example, not to be followed but studiously to be avoided. Europe made labor the differential, and the price of it all is enmity and antagonism and prostrated industry. The right of labor to live in peace and comfort must be recognized by governments and America should be the first to lay the foundation stones upon which industrial peace shall be built.

Labor not only is entitled to an adequate wage, but capital should receive a reasonable return upon its investment and is entitled to protection at the hands of the government in every emergency. No government worthy of the name can "play" these elements against each other, for there is a mutuality of interest between them which the government must seek to express and to safeguard at all cost.

The right of individuals to strike is inviolate and ought not to be interfered with by any process of government, but there is a predominant right and that is the right of the government to protect all of its people and to assert its power and majesty against the challenge of any class. The government, when it asserts that right, seeks not to antagonize a class but simply to defend the right of the whole people as against the irreparable harm and injury that might be done by the attempt by any class to usurp a power that only government itself has a right to exercise as a protection to all.

In the matter of international disputes which have led to war, statesmen have sought to set up as a remedy arbitration for war. Does this not point the way for the settlement of industrial disputes, by the establishment of a tribunal, fair and just alike to all, which will settle industrial disputes which in the past have led to war and disaster? America, witnessing the evil consequences which have followed out of such disputes between these contending forces, must not admit itself impotent to deal with these matters by means of peaceful processes. Surely, there must be some method of bringing together in a council of peace and amity these two great interests, out of which will come a happier day of peace and cooperation, a day that will make men more hopeful and enthusiastic in their various tasks, that will make for more comfort and happiness in living and a more tolerable condition among all classes of men. Certainly human intelligence can devise some acceptable tribunal for adjusting the differences between capital and labor.

This is the hour of test and trial for America. By her prowess and strength, and the indomitable courage of her soldiers, she demonstrated her power to vindicate on foreign battlefields her conceptions of liberty and justice. Let not her influence as a mediator between capital and labor be weakened and her own failure to settle matters of purely domestic concern be proclaimed to the world. There are those in this country who threaten direct action to force their will upon a majority. Russia today, with its blood and terror, is a painful object lesson of the power of minorities. It makes little difference what minority it is; whether capital or labor, or any other class; no sort of privilege will ever be permitted to dominate this country. We are a partnership or nothing that is worth while. We are a democracy, where the majority are the masters, or all the hopes and purposes of the men who founded this government have been defeated and forgotten. In America there is but one way by which great reforms can be accomplished and the relief sought by classes obtained, and that is through the orderly processes of representative government. Those who would propose any other method of reform are enemies of this country. America will not be daunted by threats nor lose her composure or calmness in these distressing times. We can afford, in the midst of this day of passion and unrest, to be self-contained and sure. The instrument of all reform in America is the ballot. The road to economic and social reform in America is the straight road of justice to all classes and conditions of men. Men have but to follow this road to realize the full fruition of their objects and purposes. Let those beware who would take the shorter road of disorder and revolution. The right road is the road of justice and orderly process.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PHIPPS. I send to the desk a telegram which I have received from the Colorado and New Mexico Coal Operators' Association, which I ask may be read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

DENVER, COLO., November 25, 1919.

Hon. LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We are much surprised at statement made by McAdoo concerning excess profits of coal operators, first, because it leads the public to believe the profits of operators through the whole country were as he states them; second, because we have believed data in the Internal-Revenue Department was confidential and that no officer or employee or ex-officer or employee, under his oath, is permitted to make such information public, either for public purposes or for his own private advantage. Are we correct in the latter assumption? And, if so, by what means can McAdoo justify his action? We wish to say that so far as Colorado is concerned McAdoo's statement wholly misrepresents that fact. Coal mining in Colorado statement showed a profit of 20 cents a ton in 1918, out of which income taxes and excess profits, if any, had to be paid, and for the first six months of 1919 coal-operators in Colorado showed a loss of 4 cents per ton. In justice to the operators of this State we are warranted in asking that this statement have the widest publicity you are in position to give it.

COLORADO AND NEW MEXICO COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION, By F. R. WOOD, President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I present resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce of Georgia; of the board of directors of the Brunswick Board of Trade, of Georgia; and of the Commercial Club, of Savannah, Ga., relative to our merchant marine. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present resolutions adopted by the chamber of commerce of Astoria, Oreg., favoring an appropriation for the erection of a suitable post office and Federal building at that city. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASTORIA, OREG., November 18, 1919.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialist, the Astoria Chamber of Commerce, of the city of Astoria, most respectfully represents that within the past few years there has been erected in the city of Astoria, in Clatsop County, Oreg., a modern courthouse, at a cost of $250,000, and by the school district within the city a high-school building, at a cost of $126,000, and a large grammar school, at a cost of $100,000, and the city of Astoria has erected a modern city hall, at a cost of $50,000, and has reclaimed and filled the first, second, and third units of a reclamation project in the city at a cost of $675,000, involving the raising of buildings to grades, at a cost of $200,000, and construction of hard-surfaced streets and paving costing $1,000,000, with work on the fourth unit of the reclamation project about to commence, which will involve an additional expenditure of $75,000, and the port of Astoria has constructed public docks, grain elevators, flour mill, and belt line railway, at an expenditure of $3,000,000, and is now proposing further similar expenditures for additional docks, dry docks, and marine railway; and

Whereas the Astoria post office was rated first class on July 1, 1917, and handled a total business during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, amounting to more than $1,000,000, with postal deposits aggregating $315,000, and further is used as a distributing center for mail to and from the entire county of Clatsop, Oreg., and the southwestern portion of Wahkiakum County and the western portion of Pacific County, Wash. The present combined post office and customhouse, which was built a half century ago, when Astoria had less than one-tenth of its present population, is so old, so insanitary, and so small as to be a disgrace to the community and is inadequate and unsuited for the purpose and not in harmony with other public buildings and civic improvements of the city, the dimensions of the workroom, in which 22 employees of the Post Office Department are obliged to work and through which this heavy volume of business must be handled, being only 31 by 45 feet, and the dimensions of the lobby used by the public approximately only 10 by 40 feet, or so small as to cause continual congestion and to prevent proper service being afforded the public. Further, the accommodations afforded in the present building for the customhouse are entirely inadequate, seriously restricted and congested, and the present Federal building is so small as to afford no room for such other Federal departments, as the office of the Immigration Service and quarantine station, which departments are now located in separate office buildings in different parts of the city, the United States Government paying substantial rents therefor. Under these circumstances the citizens of Astoria feel that they are justly entitled to an adequate and modern post office and Federal building commensurate with its importance for the present and future growth of the city.

Therefore we most respectfully urge your honorable body to pass a bill making an appropriation for at least $500,000 for the erection of a suitable post office and Federal building, because this seaport, with its shipping facilities, shipbuilding plants, salmon canneries, sawmills, and other numerous industries, will have approximately 50,000 people by the time the building is completed; and we furthermore urge that prompt action be taken that the emergency conditions set forth may be alleviated at the earliest possible date consistent with favorable action on the part of your honorable body.

It is hereby directed that a copy of this memorial, duly signed by the president and secretary of the chamber of commerce, be forwarded to the Senators and Representatives of the State of Oregon in Congress, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, D. C.

FRANK H. SANLOM, President,
C. I. BASS, Secretary,
Chamber of Commerce of the City of Astoria, Oreg.

Mr. McKELLAR. I present a telegram, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objections, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., Nov. 30, 1919.

Senator K. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

Mass meeting Symphony Hall, Boston, to-night, twenty-seven hundred people present, adopted the following resolution, presented by Mayor Peters, without a single dissenting vote:

Resolved, That the national welfare requires a speedy ratification of the treaty of Versailles and the league of nations, and we call upon the President and the Senate of the United States to adjust their differences by mutual concessions to the end that we may have peace and an enduring peace.

GEN. CHARLES H. COLE, Presiding.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present communications and telegrams in the nature of petitions, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communications and telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by Claude L. Sauls Post, No. 13, American Legion, Tallahassee, Fla., November 25, 1919.

Whereas on November 11, at Centralia, Wash., four members of the American Legion were assassinated by persons belonging to an organization known as the Industrial Workers of the World; and

Whereas there are at large in the United States large numbers of persons, including members of the Industrial Workers of the World, certain reds or radicals, and believers in Bolshevik doctrines, who are spreading propaganda and political theories tending to undermine and destroy our system of free government, and the ideals for which the American Legion stands: Therefore be it

Resolved by the members of Claude L. Sauls Post No. 13, That we, the members of this post, do most severely condemn the activities of those organizations and individuals hereinabove mentioned, and that we deplore the murdering of members of the American Legion by the said organizations; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge upon our representatives in the Congress of the United States that most effective and stringent measures be taken to suppress and stamp out this evil, and to send elsewhere those who are dissatisfied with our form of government; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to our Representatives and Senators in Congress, to the national and State headquarters of this organization, and copies be furnished the newspapers for publication.

Adopted by Claude L. Sauls Post No. 13, American Legion, at Tallahassee, Fla., this 25th day of November, 1919.

W. E. GRISSETT,
Commander above-named post.

Attest:
R. S. APPLEYARD,
Adjutant, above-named post.

ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA., December 1, 1919.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Destructive radicalism, which seems uncontrollable under present laws, should no longer be permitted to flourish in this country. Adequate restrictive measures should be passed without delay.

J. D. RAHNER.

PLANT CITY, FLA., December 1, 1919.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.:

The Norman McLeod Post, No. 26, American Legion, Plant City, Fla., demands that you and each of your associates in Congress and the Senate do all within their power to wipe out the murder of four of our comrades at Centralia on Liberty Day and other un-American depredations by introducing and supporting legislation to rid our country of I. W. W.'s, Bolsheviks, anarchists, and all other un-American organizations and all alien slackers.

J. W. ALSOBROOK,
Post Commander.

Resolution.

The Harrison-Hunter Post, No. 32, American Legion, Winter Park, Fla., takes action in favor of exporting all I. W. W. people in the United States. The murdering of four American soldiers at Centralia, Wash., we consider an outrage, and believe Congress should act on this matter at once. It is time for a real house cleaning in America, and a thorough one, cost what it may. If it will take the Army and the Navy to wipe them out, we stand ready; if the Department of Justice can do it, let us have vigorous action; if vigilance committees are needed, let us have them appointed at once. There is no room on American soil for such specimens of humanity. Their presence is an insult. The American Legion stands for 100 per cent Americanism and believes that the United States is no place for anyone who has less than 100 per cent Americanism.

Should congressional action be sought on individuals and organizations un-American, we, the members of the Harrison-Hunter Post, No. 32, most respectfully and earnestly request your absolute support on the passing of such a measure.

RAYMOND W. GREENE,
Post Commander.
R. H. GALT,
Post Adjutant.

DAYTONA, FLA., November 25, 1919.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The following resolution was unanimously adopted at a meeting of the Russell C. Warner Post of the American Legion held last night:

"Whereas very serious industrial and social outbreaks have occurred in various parts of our country, causing the loss of life and the threatened extinction of our cherished American institutions;

"Whereas the continuation and spread of these outbreaks and seditious influences threaten the very foundations of our national life: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we oppose any act on the part of any individual or organization that is unpatriotic and un-American; that we hold ourselves in readiness to defend with our lives the safety of Americans, our homes, and our democratic institutions against any individual or organized force that seeks their destruction or threatens the complete enjoyment of the liberties and privileges bought by the blood of our forefathers: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we petition the National Congress, through our elected Representatives, to take positive and definite steps to immediately purge our country of all individuals and organizations un-American and to carry on an extensive educational and publicity campaign on Americanism."

RUSSELL C. WARNER POST, AMERICAN LEGION,
J. L. PEPPER, Adjutant.

THE JOHN G. SALLEY POST, No 43,
THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Homestead, Fla., November 26, 1919.

Whereas we consider the murder of our brothers in arms of the Grant Hodge Post, No. 17, Centralia, Wash., by the I. W. W.'s an act of downright, premediated murder, treachery, and anarchy against our Government; and

Whereas the society of the I. W. W. is a serious menace to our country and are admitted to be enemies of law and order; and

Whereas there appears to be an organized and prepared campaign by the society of the I. W. W. and others to create a state of lawlessness and crime throughout our entire country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the John G. Salley Post, No. 43, of the American Legion, State of Florida, condemns the actions of the I. W. W.'s not only in Centralia, Wash., but throughout the country at large.

That congressional action on individuals and organizations un-American be demanded and that all undesirable citizens be deported at once.

That Americanism must be the big issue now and be required from every citizen.

That the John G. Salley Post, No. 43, assist in any campaign carried on against the persons or societies un-American and that they will be responsible for conditions in their district.

That a copy of these resolutions be mailed to our Congressman and Senators, and to urge upon them the necessity of their attention to the formation of such laws as will forever stamp out these traitors to law and order from our country.

The officers of the Church Peace Union issue the following statement with regard to the failure of the United States Senate to ratify the treaty of Versailles with its covenant of the league of nations:

We view with concern and indignation the lamentable lack of statesmanship that has led to the failure of the treaty in the Senate. On so weighty a matter, fraught with incalculable consequences to humanity, it ought to be possible for patriotic and fair-minded men, regardless of partisan or personal prejudice, to get together in working out a safe and full cooperation of this country in a real international order. Political partisanship on such an issue is shameful and inexcusable.

Especially do we deprecate certain motives which have conspicuously played a large part in the defeat of the covenant—distrust of other nations, unwillingness to join with them in a common effort to minimize war by organizing the moral forces of mankind and by furthering international cooperation, a disposition to demand special exemption and consideration for our own country, and a reluctance to let America bear her due share of the burden of common human need. We covet for this country the true greatness of unlimited service. We long to see America first in helpfulness, in courage, in eagerness for a new and better order, in largeness of soul. More than any other danger we fear the danger of losing, through reactions of selfishness and timidity, the unequaled opportunities the present hour offers our country.

We urge the Members of the United States Senate, regardless of party or of past position, to unite in speedy ratification of the treaty, with such reservations only as may leave unimpaired the covenant of the league of nations and provide for America's entrance on just and equal terms, without special privileges or exemptions.

And we urge all in this country who have faith in God and love for their fellow men to exert at once all the influence they possess in word, in prayer, and in act, to avert from our beloved country the deep disgrace of abandoning the ideals for which we fought and the shame of putting safety first in this hour of the world's deep and dreadful need.

MILTON, MASS., December 1, 1919.

DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.:

I earnestly urge you to use your great influence in ratifying the peace treaty immediately. Both Republicans and Democrats must be willing to compromise on reservations for the sake of the world's safety and peace as well as of national honor.

MRS. J. MALCOM FORBES.

Mr. EDGE. I present a memorial referring to outrages in Ukrainia, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At a meeting held this 24th day of November, 1919, in the borough of Woodbine, County of Cape May, and State of New Jersey, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas authentic information has been obtained to the effect that 100,000 Jews of all ages, sexes, and conditions have already been killed outright in the cities, towns, and villages of Ukrainia by military forces and civilian bands who were let loose upon the defenseless Jewish people, destroying their homes and reducing hundreds of thousands to utter starvation and despair: Be it therefore

"Resolved, That we solemnly protest against the perpetration of these inhuman and barbaric practices and most earnestly appeal to the American people and our Government, as well as to the whole civilized world, in the name of humanity, to intercede in behalf of the unfortunate Jews of Ukrainia to the end that the hand of the assassin may be stayed and that life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness for the Jewish people of those regions may be secure; and be it further

"Resolved, That a committee to be duly selected shall, with all due dispatch, proceed to Washington and respectfully submit this resolution, together with all available data appertaining to these matters, to the Senators of our State and the Congressman of our District."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 3066) to provide for the incorporation of cooperative associations in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendments and submitted a report (No. 310) thereon.

Mr. NEWBERRY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1661) for the relief of Maj. Ellis B. Miller, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 311) thereon.

DETROIT RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 3452) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Detroit, Mich., a municipal corporation, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the American Channel of the Detroit River at Belle Isle, to report it favorably with an amendment, and I submit a report (No. 312) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment was, in line 3, after the word "That," to strike out "the consent of Congress" and insert "authority," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority is hereby granted to the city of Detroit, a municipal corporation of the State of Michigan, and its successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the American Channel of the Detroit River, to Belle Isle, in said city, at or near Grand Boulevard East, and at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the city of Detroit, Mich., a municipal corporation, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the American Channel of the Detroit River to Belle Isle."

ALLOWANCES TO NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. PAGE. I report back, with an amendment, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 213) continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy, and I submit a report (No. 313) thereon.

This is a joint resolution similar to a resolution which heretofore passed the Senate, but with a slight clerical error. It has gone to the other House, and that body has passed it and returned it to the Senate. The vote has been practically unanimous in both Houses in favor of the joint resolution, but in order to correct a clerical error the House committee requests that we amend the joint resolution and return it, as that will relieve it from certain parliamentary conditions which are unfavorable. I ask that the report of the committee may be read, and I also ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 213) continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the resolution do pass with amendments.

After the word "repealed," line 5 of page 2, add:

"Provided, That officers of the Navy and Marine Corps shall be entitled to all the rights and benefits under said act of April 16, 1918 (Public, No. 129), from and after October 1, 1919, and during the present emergency."

Change the title of the resolution by striking out the period after the word "Navy" and adding the words "and Marine Corps."

Amend the preamble, first line, by striking out the word "will" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "has," and strike out the word "have"; fifth line, strike out the period after the parenthesis, insert in lieu thereof a comma, and add the word "and."

Allowances for officers of the Navy are the same according to statute law, act of March 3, 1899, as for officers of corresponding rank in the Army. The repeal of the section referred to is simply to continue for officers of the Navy and Marine Corps the same commutation as is being paid to officers of the Army, and inasmuch as the provision limits this commutation to October 1, 1919, the committee earnestly requests that early action be taken.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee as to whether the joint resolution has had the consideration of the Naval Affairs Committee?

Mr. PAGE. It has had such consideration, and has also had the consideration of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives. It is for the purpose of correcting an error which is purely clerical. It was the intention to have the legislation effective from October 1, but by mistake of the printer it only reaches back to October 14.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was simply inquiring as to the consideration of the joint resolution by the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. PAGE. It has been considered by that committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. When was it considered in committee?

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator that it has been considered very elaborately by both the Naval Affairs Committee of the House and the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate, and has been passed by both Houses of Congress.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I desire to say that a similar resolution passed the Senate early in the last session, and it was also passed by the House. All the joint resolution does is to continue the allowance for commutation of quarters to naval officers who are in active service at sea. Under the old law if an officer was on land he received commutation of quarters, but if he were at sea fighting he received no allowance for commutation of quarters. We changed that a year ago during the pendency of the war. At the last session of Congress, on the naval appropriation bill, the Senate enacted a provision allowing commutation of quarters to naval officers at sea. Such a provision was not contained in the House bill, but in conference we continued it until the 1st of October. The 1st of October has now passed, so that commutation of quarters will not be allowed to naval officers who are at sea in Asiatic, European, or Pacific coast waters. I understand this measure simply continues the allowance for commutation of quarters for the next year as it was allowed up until the 1st of last October.

Mr. LODGE. That is all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I recall some discussion of this general subject before the Naval Affairs Committee a year ago. All I was inquiring about, however, was when this particular measure had been given the consideration of the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. SWANSON. I was present when it was considered.

Mr. LODGE. So was I.

Mr. SWANSON. It was not a very full meeting of the committee, perhaps, although a quorum was present.

Mr. LODGE. A quorum was present; I was present, and the measure was fully discussed. I repeat, it also passed the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. It was considered by the Naval Affairs Committee at the last session of Congress.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; it was considered at the last session.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is not at all unlikely; but I take this occasion to advise the chairman of the committee that the clerk of the committee seems to have forgotten I am a member of the committee, for I no longer receive any notices of the meetings. I do not know how it is as to others, but some very important business has been transacted by the committee in recent times of which I have had no notice whatever.

Mr. SWANSON. This measure was under consideration at the last session, but, as I understand, Congress adjourned without having acted finally on it. The cloture rule precluded any possibility of its passage.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am merely asserting that it was considered at some meeting of the committee at which I was not present and of which, apparently, I had no notice.

Mr. LODGE. It passed the Senate on October 14.

Mr. PAGE. I am quite certain, Mr. President, that the Senator had notice of the meeting at which the measure was considered, as he has had notice of every meeting since the session commenced last May. I take a great deal of pains to send notices to the homes of Senators, as well as to their offices, and I am very certain that the Senator had the usual notice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment.

The amendment was, on page 2, line 5, after the word "repealed," to insert:

Provided, That officers of the Navy and Marine Corps shall be entitled to all the rights and benefits under said act of April 16, 1918 (Public, No. 129), from and after October 1, 1919, and during the present emergency.

So as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the paragraph in the act of July 11, 1919 (public, No. 8), which reads as follows:

"The act of April 16, 1918 (public, No. 129), granting under certain conditions to every commissioned officer of the Army the right to quarters in kind for their dependents or the authorized commutation therefor, including the allowances for heat and light, shall hereafter be construed to apply to officers of the Navy and Marine Corps only during the period of the war and in no event beyond October 1, 1919," be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That officers of the Navy and Marine Corps shall be entitled to all the rights and benefits under said act of April 16, 1918 (public, No. 129), from and after October 1, 1919, and during the present emergency.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

The preamble was amended so as to read:

Whereas since it now appears that peace has not been declared by October 1, 1919, on which date officers of the Navy, by operation of law, will cease to receive the benefits prescribed in the act of April 16, 1918 (public, No. 129); and.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy and the Marine Corps."

INCOME-TAX REPORT OF COAL OPERATORS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The introduction of bills and joint resolutions is in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I desire to submit a Senate resolution, and, on account of the importance of the subject matter, I shall ask, after it has been read, unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution as requested.

The Secretary proceeded to read the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. Does not this matter properly come under the next order—Senate resolutions?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does, if there is any objection. The Senator, however, asked unanimous consent, and the Chair was trying to find out if there was objection.

Mr. LODGE. I did not hear the Senator's request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be first read.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the resolution, which is as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to send to the Senate such facts or data as may be in his possession, or available, showing the percentage and amount of individual net earnings of the various operators of bituminous coal-mine properties within the United States for the years 1916, 1917, and 1918, as disclosed by the income-tax returns of such operators for said years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the resolution ask for information as to the amount of taxes paid by the concerns indicated?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The resolution asks for information as to the percentage of profits on coal received by the operators as shown by their income-tax reports.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it a Senate resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. It is a Senate resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I doubt, Mr. President, whether the Senate can pass a resolution of that kind and expect an answer when it is in violation of a statute of Congress. I think the Senator, after consideration, will have to change it to a joint resolution rather than a Senate resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. My understanding is that the President may permit such information to be given out at any time. Perhaps I am not thoroughly informed as to the law, but I can not see why a resolution calling for such information should be a joint resolution. It only asks for certain information which the country now certainly is interested in having.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no objection, so far as I know, to securing the information if it is obtained in the proper way; but, as I remember the law, the information can not be obtained unless the law itself is modified.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator from Utah that, as I remember the law, the President has authority to permit such information to be given out, and he could give it without a request if he desired so to do. I presume the Secretary of the Treasury will refuse to give the information unless the President under the law directed the information to be given. I do not see anything wrong in the Senate making the request, and if the President declines to accede to it of course the information can not be given.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have not a copy of the law before me, and therefore I can not say just what it does provide.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think there is any doubt about the law being as I have stated.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from South Dakota will allow the resolution to go over for a few moments——

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not object to it.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will allow it to go over for a few moments I will look up the law, and if the resolution is not in conflict with the law then I shall have no objection to its passage. Temporarily, however, I ask the Senator to allow the resolution to go over.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I would prefer, if that course is satisfactory to the Senator, to adopt the resolution, and then if the Senator finds that it has not been passed according to the law I will withdraw it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would very much prefer to have it go over than to make any arrangement of that kind, because I could not carry it out if I wanted to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands there is objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Do I understand the Senator from Utah objects to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I object to its immediate consideration; but I will say to the Senator that if it develops that the resolution can be passed in accordance with the law I will be glad to withdraw the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 3459) for the relief of Peter S. Kelly; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, on an examination of the bill introduced by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], being Senate bill 3297, it occurred to me that certain amendments were very desirable. I endeavored to frame amendments, but they were quite numerous and brought about so many changs in the bill that I decided to offer another bill on the same subject following very much the lines of the bill introduced by the Senator from Tennessee. It is a bill to punish conspiracy against organized government. I introduce the bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LAWS GOVERNING ELECTIONS.

Mr. MOSES. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 129) to provide for an inquiry into the laws governing elections in the several States of the Union was read the first time by its title and the second time at length as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 129) to provide for an inquiry into the laws governing elections in the several States of the Union.

Resolved, etc., That a joint congressional committee is hereby created, consisting of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Representatives in Congress, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, whose duty it shall be to make thorough inquiry into the laws governing the elections in the several States of the Union with a view to ascertaining whether in any State the right of citizens of the United States to vote is denied or abridged in violation of the terms of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution; and if it shall be found that representation in the Electoral College and the National House of Representatives is enlarged through such denial or abridgement, the committee shall then recommend to Congress such legislation as will reduce the representation in said State or States, as provided by the fourteenth amendment. Said joint committee shall also take into consideration all conditions under which the suffrage is exercised, denied, or abridged, no less than the laws themselves under which it is done, and it shall report its conclusions to the Congress not later than July 1, 1920.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask what disposition has been made of the joint resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MOSES. I asked that it might be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; but the Chair has referred it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MOSES. I submit to the Chair.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO RAILROAD-CONTROL BILL.

Mr. KING submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

GOLD CERTIFICATES.

Mr. SMOOT. I introduce a bill, which I ask to have read.

The bill (S. 3458) to make gold certificates of the United States payable to bearer on demand legal tender was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That gold certificates of the United States, payable to bearer on demand, shall be, and are hereby, made legal tender in payment of all debts and dues, public and private.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts which are inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on account of the urgency of this legislation, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement in regard to it at this time. The chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency is not present, but I should like and I will state also that the department would like immediate action on this proposed legislation, if possible.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before the Senator makes his statement, I want to ask him if he is not aware that at present the gold dollar is the short-legged dollar in the United States; and how can we comply with the old sound-money position and argument by paying the public creditors in unsound money, in 95-cent money? If the Senator will change his bill and make silver certificates legal tender, silver now representing the regnant metal, I will vote for it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have an explanation for the bill, which will not take very long, and if the Senate will give permission, I will proceed.

The business interests of the country are in such shape to-day that they are unable to do the business that is required of them on account of the lack of one and two dollar bills. Every part of this country is calling upon the Government for one and two dollar currency. I want to say in passing that what has brought about the shortage of one and two dollar bills at this time is the withdrawal from circulation of all silver certificates. I say "all." Of course, that is a sweeping statement, but practically all silver certificates have been withdrawn from circulation. The reason for that, of course, is apparent to all. As soon as silver advances beyond $1.29 the silver certificate that can draw silver from our Treasury on presentation is at a premium; or, in other words, they can take the silver dollar to-day and sell it as bullion for more than the dollar is worth as a circulating medium.

That is the situation we find the Government in to-day, and therefore we must provide some way to meet the demands of the business of the country by issuing paper currency of some kind and in smaller denominations.

Now, Mr. President, I want to state briefly just what this bill is and how it will meet the present situation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator how these silver certificates get out of circulation? Does the speculator pick them up?

Mr. SMOOT. The speculator gathers them up and is no doubt holding for advanced value.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And he goes to the Treasury and actually gets the silver on them?

Mr. SMOOT. He can go to the Treasury and get silver dollars.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Can the Senator tell us how much actual coin has been thus withdrawn from the Treasury?

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator before I get through just what silver has been exported from the United States since the passage of the so-called Pittman Act; and really, I want to say in passing, I had no idea that there had been so much exported.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will give the country assurance that we are not going on the silver basis. We know what that means, if the arguments that we have heard in this Chamber for so many years be sound.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to be drawn into a question of "16 to 1" at this particular time.

Mr. THOMAS. "Sixteen to one" no longer exists. It is about 15 to 1 or 14½ to 1.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I call attention now to the classification of $1 and $2 bills as they exist to-day in the Treasury of the United States and in circulation throughout the country:

Umted States notes (legal tenders)	$152,560,518
Treasury notes of 1890	525,832
Federal reserve bank notes	220,865,800
National-bank notes	505,464
Silver certificates	121,869,917
Total	496,327,531

The act of April 23, 1918, commonly known as the "Pittman Act," authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to melt or break up silver dollars, and section 5 of that act provides "that in order to prevent contraction of the currency the Federal reserve banks may be either permitted or required by the Federal Reserve Board, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, to issue Federal reserve bank notes, in any denominations—including denominations of $1 and $2—authorized by the Federal Reserve Board, in an aggregate amount not exceeding the amount of standard silver dollars melted or broken up and sold as bullion under the authority of this act, upon deposit as provided by law with the Treasurer of the United States as security therefor, of United States certificates of indebtedness, or of United States one-year gold notes."

With the exception of about $9,000,000 of Federal reserve bank notes which had been issued previously under authority of section 4 of the Federal reserve act, the Federal reserve bank notes outstanding at present have been issued under authority of the Pittman Act, under which act alone is any provision made for the issue of Federal reserve bank notes in $1 and $2 denominations.

During the past two years there has been a heavy demand for silver, principally from oriental countries, which resulted in an exportation of silver from April 23 to December 31, 1918, amounting to $258,209,000.

From January 1 to October 31, 1919, exports of silver from this country amounted to $167,335,000, being total exports of $425,544,000 since the Pittman Act became a law on April 23, 1918. To this amount, of course, should be added the figures for November, which are not yet available.

The demand for silver has resulted in a marked increase in the price of silver bullion, and quotations during the past week have ranged between $1.29 and $1.37½ per ounce, and the average maintained was considerably above $1.2929, which is the coinage value. In consequence of the enhancement in the value of silver metal, silver dollars can now be exported at a profit, and silver certificates, which are redeemable in silver dollars, have practically disappeared from circulation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator whether this melting process under the Pittman Act still continues?

Mr. SMOOT. Not as far as our Government is concerned; but I want to say to the Senator that silver dollars have been exported from the United States outside of what the Government has exported.

Mr. THOMAS. The Pittman Act, as of course the Senator knows, was an emergency war measure.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and I will say to the Senator that the Government has lived strictly within the terms of the so-called Pittman Act. I was going to advise the Senator just exactly the number of silver dollars that have been sold for exportation under the Pittman Act, but I am quite sure I covered that in my statement.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator did cover it.

Mr. SMOOT. As Federal reserve bank notes in denominations of $1 and $2 can not be issued in sums exceeding the amount of silver dollars broken up and exported, and as the silver certificates, for the reason above stated, are no longer available for purposes of circulation, there has developed an unprecedented shortage in paper currency of the denominations of $1 and $2.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before the Senator goes further and leaves the other branch of the matter, I desire to inquire of him if his figures show just exactly how much silver was sold under the Pittman Act, and how much was actually drawn from the Treasury by the surrender of silver certificates?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not get that information from the department, and really, I will say to the Senator, I did not think of asking for it. The last report I saw from the department showed about $152,000,000——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of what?

Mr. SMOOT. Of silver dollars that had been withdrawn from the Treasury for exportation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Upon the surrender of silver certificates?

Mr. SMOOT. Upon the issuing of Federal reserve bank notes. That silver has been exported to Japan and China principally, and some to India.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I may be confused about this matter, but my understanding is that silver certificates are issued upon the deposit of silver in the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will remember that under the Pittman Act Federal reserve bank notes in denominations of $1 and $2 can not be issued in sums exceeding the amount of the silver dollars broken up and exported. In other words, the Pittman Act authorized the taking of silver dollars from the Treasury of the United States, breaking them up, and exporting them, and issuing for the amount taken out Federal reserve bank notes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; I understand that perfectly well.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I think there are about 152,000,000 dollars so broken up and exported.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is all right. I appreciate perfectly that the Pittman Act authorized the disposition of so much silver in the Treasury; that was authorized by Congress, and we must assume whatever responsibility there is in that. But I am not concerned about that. What I would like to know is to what extent the other process has gone on, namely, the picking up of silver certificates and the withdrawal of silver from the Treasury by the deposit of silver certificates, because if that were going on to any considerable extent I am surprised that the Director of the Mint did not communicate with Congress and apprise us of the fact.

Mr. SMOOT. I can say this to the Senator, that in the Treasury of the United States on November 1, 1918, there were silver certificates amounting to $315,732,826.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not silver certificates, but silver?

Mr. SMOOT. Silver certificates. I am speaking of silver certificates now, but for every silver certificate issued there was silver deposited in the Treasury to cover the same.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator means silver certificates out?

Mr. SMOOT. On November 1, 1919, those silver certificates had decreased from $315,732,826 to $156,135,714. So at least within that year there was the difference between the $315,000,000 and the $156,000,000 that had been withdrawn.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. Is it not a fact, however, that when the silver certificates, which were represented by the silver dollars that were melted up, came in, they were canceled, and then the securities of the Federal reserve notes were reduced to that extent? Was not that the process?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is as the act provides. A large and immediate additional supply of these bills is absolutely necessary for industrial and commercial purposes. The Treasury has on hand an adequate supply of United States notes, or legal tenders, of the denominations of $1 and $2, but can issue them only in exchange for unfit notes or for notes of larger denominations. There are outstanding United States notes, or legal tenders, of denominations above $2, $175,453,466, which are held in large part by the banks because of their legal-tender quality.

The bill that I have just introduced provides that the United States gold certificates payable to bearer on demand, which are and must always be secured 100 per cent by gold coin or bullion held in the Treasury or Subtreasuries of the United States, be made legal tender for all dues, public and private. The Federal Reserve Board has given its hearty indorsement to this proposition, and the Secretary of the Treasury strongly favors action of this kind.

The passage of the bill would not change in any way the present reserve situation, for section 19 of the Federal reserve act provides that all lawful reserves of member banks must be carried not in cash in their own vaults but exclusively in the shape of collected balances with the Federal reserve banks. The bill does not propose to give the legal-tender quality to $10,000 gold certificates, which are payable to order, and of which there are $654,670,000.

Remember, the bill only gives a legal tender to the gold certificates that are payable to bearer on demand, or those of denominations under $10,000.

Mr. THOMAS. May I not ask the Senator whether those certificates have not the legal-tender quality? The gold certificates were very common in our circulation prior to the war.

Mr. SMOOT. The gold certificates are not a legal tender.

Mr. THOMAS. Neither is the silver certificate, but everybody takes it.

Mr. SMOOT. In ordinary business transactions, yes; but there is this about it, I will say to the Senator. It has occurred time and time again, where a contract has been made between a bank and an individual, or between individuals, the payment to be in legal tender, those contracts have failed on account of the party offering checks; many times they have failed on account of the party offering silver or gold certificates, and if the party who made the contract desired to get out of it, of course he could then immediately say that his contract had not been fulfilled, the party not having offered legal tender.

Mr. THOMAS. I, of course, accept the Senator's statement.

Mr. SMOOT. I assure the Senator they are not legal tender.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that may be true; in fact, I accept the Senator's statement that it is true; but in all my experience

I never before heard of a refusal to accept a gold certificate in payment of a debt or the cancellation of an obligation.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the Treasury Department assures me, and I have always understood it to be the case, that wherever there is a contract, and one of the parties to the contract desires to get out of it, unless legal tender is offered in full payment for the contract the party desiring to get out of it has the right under the law to do so.

Mr. President, the gold certificates, I wish to say here in passing, amount to $1,463,972,069 to-day. There are $800,284,057 of them held in the Treasury, and there are $239,248,280 held by Federal reserve agents. As I stated before, there are $654,670,000 that are payable to order. The balance of them are payable to bearer on demand.

The net amount of gold certificates in circulation is $424,439,732, the denominations of which range from $10 to $5,000. As these certificates are receipts of the Government for gold deposited with it, and as each certificate must be redeemed in gold on demand, there seems to be no good reason why a gold certificate payable to bearer on demand and which can command the actual gold at any time should not be made a legal tender for all public and private dues.

Should the bill become a law, the banks would no longer have any object in holding the United States legal-tender notes, and would, without doubt, immediately release them to the Treasury in exchange for $1 and $2 notes. The supply of gold certificates would be more than ample for the needs of those desiring to make legal tenders on contracts or debts, and the gold certificates would be found much more convenient for this purpose than gold coin itself.

I would like to see a prompt passage of the bill, for, as already stated, the need for additional currency of $1 and $2 denominations is most imperative, and the business and industry of the country will be seriously hampered if this need is not supplied at once.

I may say, in conclusion, that while the present price of silver makes the circulation of silver certificates and silver dollars impossible, the advance has not been sufficiently great as to interfere with the subsidiary silver coinage, for the relative silver content of a half dollar and smaller coins is less than that of the dollar. The price of silver would have to advance to above $1.38 an ounce in order to make the melting of subsidiary coins profitable.

Mr. President, I have taken a little longer in making this statement than I had anticipated.

Mr. THOMAS. Do I understand the Senator to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I hope the Committee on Banking and Currency will immediately report the bill to the Senate and ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if they consider the sound-money sentiment of the Nation, and its insistence upon the use only of gold in payment of debts as long as gold is worth more than silver, I trust that the committee, when the bill is reported back, will have stricken out the word "gold" in the proposed bill and inserted the word "silver," because we can not afford, Mr. President, under any circumstances, to even seem to authorize the payment of either public or private debts in a depreciated currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

SENATE PAGES.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 239), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to employ five additional pages for the Senate Chamber at $3 per day each during the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, to be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

MRS. FANNY M'FALL.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 240), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate to Mrs. Fanny McFall, widow of John McFall, late a policeman in the employ of the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his last illness, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

PROHIBITION AMENDMENT.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I offer a Senate resolution and ask for its immediate consideration. It is a resolution asking for information from one of the departments.

The resolution (S. Res. 241) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is hereby directed to transmit to the Senate at his earliest convenience a statement showing the States which have ratified the eighteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution and the dates of such ratifications, according to official documents on file in the Department of State.

DOCUMENT ON BOLSHEVISM.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I offer a concurrent resolution, which I ask to have read.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 19) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That that part of Senate Document No. 61, first session, Sixty-sixth Congress, under the heading "Bolshevism" and found from page 27 to the close of the first paragraph on page 43 of said document, be printed as a public document, and that 12,000,000 copies thereof be printed, 4,000,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 8,000,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, to be paid for one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Just a word, Mr. President. I believe that one of the most effective methods of meeting Bolshevism is to let the people know clearly what Bolshevism is. In the last Congress a committee of the Senate made a full and thorough investigation of the subject, under the chairmanship of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. This committee stated fully, clearly, and concisely the fundamental principles of Bolshevism, and what it is. I believe that if the people of the country could have access to that part of that report, it would go a long way to do away with the teaching of Bolshevism in this country. One of the leading attorneys of my State, Judge Howard, got a copy of this report a short time ago and is now organizing his county in the State of Washington and holding meetings and using this document as the basis of his addresses, and he states that the impression it creates is something wonderful. The people do not really know what Bolshevism is. This report shows it clearly; and I think we could not spend a little money better than to have that part of the report printed as a public document in such numbers as to make it available all over the country.

For that reason I have offered this resolution, and I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator is not making a request for unanimous consent to have this concurrent resolution considered at this time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator is merely asking that it be referred to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no objection to that; but in that connection, Mr. President, it strikes me that when you come to a matter of this sort, it has been published in the newspapers of the United States substantially, nearly all that is worth publishing, the salient points at any rate, and to convert the United States Government into a gigantic printing machine for the dissemination of information as to what constitutes Bolshevism seems to me just to help the Bolshevists spread their own propaganda. I hope that the Printing Committee will bring in an unfavorable report. I agree precisely with one of the great statesmen of America; I am never afraid of error as long as reason is left free to combat it; but I would rather that error would publish its own errors and that the Government should have nothing to do with it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator certainly misapprehends the purpose of this concurrent resolution and misapprehends the character of the report that the committee made. The Senator from North Carolina did not print in that report what the Bolshevist could use to his advantage—not at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the Senator from Washington to say that the object of the introduction of his concurrent resolution was to expose what Bolshevism really is from the utterances of the Bolshevist and from the standpoint of the Bolshevist.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken in that. It is to show what it is from the report of this committee, headed, as I say, by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. They pointed out in about 10 or 12 pages clearly what it is, what the effect of it is, and what it leads to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I simply misunderstood the Senator, partially, at any rate, and that was not his fault. It was not, in a higher sense, my fault, either. It was physically unavoidable with my deafness, coupled with the noise in the Chamber.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

CHILDREN OF FOREIGN PARENTAGE.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 18), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the following article is hereby proposed to the several States as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE 19.

"SECTION 1. No child hereafter born in the United States of foreign parentage shall be eligible to citizenship in the United States unless both parents are eligible to become citizens of the United States."

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. CURTIS. I send to the desk a notice which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

I hereby give notice that on Thursday, December 4, 1919, I shall propose the following amendment to the Standing Rules of the Senate:

"Resolved, That Rule XIX of the Standing Rules for Conducting Business in the Senate of the United States be amended by adding the following proviso at the end of the first paragraph of said rule, to wit:

"Provided, That after any question has been considered upon 5 separate calendar days, or when any question has been debated for 10 consecutive hours, it shall be in order for any Senator to rise to a question of privilege and move to close all debate and vote at a fixed time upon the pending question before the Senate after 3 hours' additional consideration. Said motion shall be submitted to the Senate and shall be determined by a yea-and-nay vote. If a majority of the Senators present vote in favor of the motion, it shall be declared carried, debate shall close, and a vote taken upon the question as provided in the motion. If less than a majority vote for the motion, the same shall be declared lost."

Mr. KELLOGG. I give the notice in writing which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

I hereby give notice that on Thursday, the 4th day of December, 1919, I shall propose the following amendment to the Standing Rules of the Senate:

"Resolved, That Rule XIX of the Standing Rules for Conducting Business in the Senate of the United States be amended by adding the following proviso at the end of the first paragraph of said rule, to wit: 'Provided, That after any measure has been considered upon three separate calendar days, or has been debated for six consecutive hours, no Senator shall speak more than one hour in the aggregate upon any such measure and any amendment thereto and any motion affecting the same.'"

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer a Senate resolution, which I ask to have read and lie over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 242) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish to the Senate, if compatible with the public interest, copies of all written communications, if any, and the substance of all verbal communications, if any, between the United States and either Great Britain, France, Italy, or Japan respecting the conditions and reservations adopted by the Senate and contained in the resolution of ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany concluded at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, and voted upon in the Senate on the 19th day of November, 1919.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The resolution goes to the Committee on Foreign Relations, does it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. I asked that it lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over under the rule and be printed.

THE LABOR SITUATION.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on the 22d day of November I received a communication from Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, inclosing a typewritten document which he requested me to make some comments upon, and also to make it a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in view of the fact that I had previously read into the RECORD certain correspondence with the Attorney General of the United States relating to comments upon an alleged construction of the law known as the Lever Act. I have complied in part with Mr. Gompers's request by making some comments upon this document, and I now ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD some communications, together with my comments thereupon, and also that they be printed in the larger type.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 22, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Inclosed you will find a typewritten document which I have prepared and expect to read this evening at an open meeting in this city, with some brief introductory remarks and some comments at the conclusion of the reading. Your name or your activities are mentioned or referred to in the document.

The whole of the matter refers to the Lever Act for food control, when that act was in the making. I think it will interest you, and I shall be pleased if you can not only read it carefully but give me your comments thereon.

The statements contained in the document are called forth by the action of the Department of Justice in the case brought against the miners.

You read into the RECORD correspondence with the Attorney General, Mr. Palmer. I ask if you will pursue the course of justice in having the inclosed statement also made part of the RECORD.

Very truly, yours,

SAML. GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

PAPER PREPARED AND READ BY SAMUEL GOMPERS AS PART OF HIS ADDRESS AT A PUBLIC MASS MEETING HELD UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE CENTRAL LABOR UNION AT TYPOGRAPHICAL TEMPLE SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 22, 1919, WASHINGTON, D. C.

(Released November 22, at 8 p. m.)

"November 9, 1919, the executive council of the American Federation of Labor issued a statement concerning the injunction granted by Judge Anderson ordering the officers of the United Mine Workers to call off a strike of miners. In that statement appears the following:

"'Both the restraining order and the injunction, in so far as its prohibitory features are concerned, are predicated upon the Lever Act, a law enacted by Congress for the purpose of preventing speculation and profiteering of the food and fuel supplies of the country. There never was in the minds of Congress in enacting that law, or in the mind of the President when he signed it, that the Lever Act would be applied to workers in case of strikes or lockouts.

"'The food controller, Mr. Hoover, specifically so states.

"'Members of the committee having the bill in charge have in writing declared that it was not in the minds of the committee, and the then Attorney General, Mr. Gregory, gave assurance that the Government would not apply that law to the workers' efforts to obtain improved working conditions. Every assurance from the highest authority of our Government was given that the law would not be so applied.'

"November 12, former Attorney General Gregory was quoted in the press as having made denial that he had given Secretary Morrison and me the assurances referred to. The press report is as follows:

"'Former Attorney General Gregory denied in a statement here to-day that he had given assurances to labor leaders that the Lever Act would not be enforced against their organizations in attempts to better working conditions, as asserted by officers of the American Federation of Labor.

"'While Attorney General I did not at any time give assurances to anyone that any law would not be enforced against any class of citizens,' he said. 'I gave no assurances that the Government would not seek to enforce the Lever Act.'

"WHAT OCCURRED DURING THE PASSAGE OF THE BILL.

"When the food bill was introduced in the House it was thus explained by Representative Lever, its author, in an interview in the New York Times of May 20, 1917:

"'Never was such a drastic bill drawn. The President has given his word that it is only a war measure and that it ceases to be in effect when the war is over. It is framed simply to safeguard the Nation's food supply for its own use and for whatever we can do for our allies while we are fighting the war out.'

"When the bill came up for action, Representative Keating, on behalf of labor, urged an amendment providing that nothing in section 4 should be construed as repealing sections 6 and 20 of the Clayton Act.

"June 22, 1917, this debate was held in the House between Represenatives Lever and Keating, as reported by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 4396:

"'Mr. LEVER. * * * We do not believe—and the matter was thoroughly discussed in the Committee on Agriculture—that this section in any wise serves to repeal or amend in the least particular either the Clayton Antitrust Act or any other act which deals with the right of men to strike for purposes of increasing their wages or bettering their living conditions. We do not believe that this affects that in the least.

"'Mr. KEATING. Let us get the issue cleared up. Let us get a concrete case. Suppose that men engaged in work on the railroads of the country—we will say the telegraph operators on a particular line in this country—decided to strike. Is it the object of the gentlemen, and is it the object of this bill, that the power shall be vested in some one to compel those men to go back to work? Let us face the issue squarely, and if this is not your purpose why not adopt this amendment?

"'Mr. LEVER. I am glad to face the issue squarely. If there were such a combination to strike for the purpose of bettering living conditions or increasing wages, there is no purpose in this bill, and there is no authority in this bill, to prevent it.'

"The following day this statement was made by Representative Keating and a letter read from Food Administrator Hoover: (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 23, 1917, p. 4515.)

"'Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is the one I offered the other day to section 4 of this bill. At that time I made it apply exclusively to section 4. In its present form it applies to the entire bill. When my amendment was before the House the other day, the contention was made that I was seeking to have farmers' organizations and labor organizations exempted from the operation of this bill. I want to impress on the Members of the House that I am not seeking any exemption for any class. Neither the farmers nor the members of labor organizations, so far as this amendment is concerned, are granted exemption from the provisions of the bill. The sole object of this amendment is to clarify the bill. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has assured us that it was not the purpose of the framers of the bill to interfere in any way with section 6 and section 20 of the Clayton antitrust law. Mr. Hoover, who will be called upon to administer this act, in a conference held a week or two ago with representatives of all the great labor organizations of the country, confirmed this view and suggested the amendment which I have offered. On that point the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, Mr. Lever, has requested me to read the following memorandum which he has received from Mr. Hoover:

"'MR. HOOVER'S MEMORANDUM FOR MR. LEVER.

"'WASHINGTON, D. C., June 22, 1917.

"'The labor representatives are very much exercised over the possible reading of the food-control bill to stretch to control of wages, and they suggest that an amendment may be made providing that the labor provisions of the Clayton Act should not be affected by the proposed bill. I understand that Mr. Keating proposed this amendment and it was defeated.

"'It appears to me that there is no intention in the bill to interfere, and I believe it might silence a great deal of criticism and opposition which might be raised in the Senate if this amendment could be undertaken. I do not wish to impose my views upon you, but simply to suggest that as it is not the intention of the bill to regulate wages it might do no harm to satisfy this element in the community that they are immune from attack.

"'Yours, faithfully,

"'HERBERT HOOVER.'

"During the meeting of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor, June 25-27, I called the attention of the members to the efforts made to have the Lever bill passed. A circular had been sent to all affiliated organizations urging them to appeal to Members of Congress. I herewith submit a copy of that portion of the minutes of the executive council pertaining to the subject:

"'President Gompers informed the executive council relative to the action taken by the officers of the American Federation of Labor to secure the enactment of the Lever bill before the 1st of July, 1917. He said in going over the bill there is a clause which might be construed to be conspiracy if a strike occurred.

"'President Gompers informed the members of the executive council that an amendment offered by Representative Keating, providing that no part of the Lever bill should annul sections 6 and 20 of the Clayton law, was defeated. President Gompers stated he believes that the amendment could be adopted in the Senate. It was decided that President Gompers draft a statement upon the amendment to be used to secure its adoption by the Senate.'

"A letter was sent to all Senators and Representatives urging that this amendment be adopted:

"'Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or 20 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.'

"Senator Hollis presented this amendment in the Senate, and it was adopted. When the bill went to conference it was stricken out. August 6, 1917, Senator Hollis called the attention of the Senate to the danger of eliminating the amendment. He read the amendment, and then this colloquy took place (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Aug. 6, 1917, p. 6401):

"'Mr. SHEPPARD. Does not the Senator think that, if necessary, such an amendment can be enacted subsequently as substantive and independent legislations?

"'Mr. HOLLIS. I think it might, but I should dislike to undertake the contract of getting it through both Houses at this time. I think the situation may be so serious that the administration will have to take hold and insist on having it passed. If so, it will go through; otherwise I doubt if it could be put through.'

"On Monday, August 6, 1917, this statement regarding the right of labor to strike was made in the Senate (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Monday, Aug. 6, 1917, p. 6403):

"'Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (Senator in charge of the bill). * * * Mr. President, there is not anything in the act, it seems to me, that would prevent labor organizations from peaceful picketing or the peaceful strike if they see fit to indulge in it; and, while, as I said, I did not vote against the Senator's amendment, and I do not recall having been with the conferees when it was receded from, I would not have hesitated to do so in conference, because I think it unnecessary. It was insisted upon by the Senate conferees for quite a while, and finally went out. I really do not know how many days it had been in conference before the Senate conferees finally receded. But, Mr. President, I have not any fear that in the administration of the food law anything would be attempted by the President or by the agencies which he has power to create under the act to prevent any labor or other organization from doing in a peaceful way all that they can now do under the Clayton law to protect themselves and their rights without any saving clause in the bill under consideration. It is not necessary in this bill in order to protect rights.'

"The defeat of the amendment caused me to call the matter to the attention of the joint meeting of the advisory commission and the Council of National Defense held August 6, 1917. Those present at the meeting were Secretary of Navy Daniels, Secretary of Commerce Redfield, Secretary of Labor Wilson, Mr. Willard, Dr. Martin, Mr. Godfrey, Mr. Rosenwald, Mr. Coffin, and Mr. Gompers. The minutes of the meeting show:

"'Commissioner Gompers expressed concern over statements that had come to his attention in connection with the pending food bill, indicating that it was the intention of certain elements influential in its framing to prevent all strikes, and that it was intended that the enactment of the law should have that effect. Mr. Gompers stated that he brought the matter to the council for its very serious consideration. On motion of Secretary Redfield it was agreed that the matter should be brought by the acting chairman to the attention of the President.'

"After returning to my office, August 6, 1917, I dictated to my secretary, among other things, this memoranda of the meeting:

"'I stated that I had within a few minutes of the meeting been informed that the amendment, offered by Senator Hollis to the food-administration bill, providing that nothing in the bill should be construed to be a repeal or modification of sections 6 and 20 (labor provisions of the Clayton Act), was defeated.

"'The Council of National Defense and advisory commission adopted a motion that the acting chairman, Mr. Daniels, be empowered and requested to present the matter—that is, the Hollis amendment and the Lever statement—to the President at the Cabinet meeting to-morrow, Tuesday. Each member of the council expressed the hope and confidence that I need have no apprehension on that score. Mr. Willard arose and stated he was in hearty accord with me on my position upon the subject of the unwisdom of trying to make strikes unlawful.

"'I should add that when I made my protest I also said: "Gentlemen, I am not going to embellish what I am going to present to you or say an unnecessary word, nor am I going to argue it. I am merely presenting to you my protest, my apprehension, in as concise and plain a manner as I possibly can."'

"The same day—August 6, 1917—I had a telephone conversation with Secretary of Agriculture Houston. My stenographer took down my part of the talk with the Secretary, as follows:

"'Mr. GOMPERS. This morning while I was in attendance at the meeting of the advisory commission Assistant Secretary of Labor, Mr. Post, called me up and he stated that a Senator, whose name he did not mention, had made a similar statement to him in regard to the amendment of Senator Hollis—that is, that the labor provisions of the Clayton antitrust law should in no wise be repealed by reason of the enactment of the food bill, and the Senator wanted to know my understanding and judgment upon the question.

"'I answered in two parts: One, that in my judgment it was not in good taste for either the Senate or the House to refuse to adopt just that proviso in order to safeguard the interests of the rights of the working people, and that there will be some considerable feeling on account of it. However, that since the Supreme Court of the United States, in a recent decision, had declared that no private individual or corporation could bring suit under the Sherman antitrust law, that it would devolve upon the Government if the Senator would make some such utterance in the Senate and base it upon the decision of the Supreme Court. I think it would be all right. In my judgment, of course, the needs of the country at the time require that the food bill be passed and I shall not say a word about it.'

"The next day, August 7, 1917, I had two telephone talks with Secretary of Labor Wilson, who called me up, one of them giving in detail a conference with President Wilson. Afterwards, on that same day, I dictated this memoranda to my secretary:

"'Secretary of Labor, Mr. Wilson, called me up saying he was going to have a special interview with the President right away on the Lever bill. He said that after his examination of the provisions of the bill to which I called the attention of the Council of National Defense yesterday he was fully convinced that the interpretation which I placed upon the language was justified; that is, that it would make strikes unlawful and punishable by imprisonment for two years. He said he had made up his mind to try and present the matter direct to the President early this morning, and he had made arrangements for that purpose; that he would call me up after the conference with the President. At 1.15 this afternoon Secretary Wilson called me up and stated that he had had the interview with the President and brought the matter to his attention. The President said that perhaps the language of the bill might be so construed as I stated to the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Wilson, and believed by him, but that yet it was with those who were handling products rather than those who were engaged in their production or distribution in the form of labor; that the situation with food products of the country was such that millions were being taken from the people every day unnecessarily and improperly, although there is not now a law to prevent it or to regulate it; that the need for the food administration law is imperative, and that any effort now to have the bill recommitted to conference committee for the insertion of the amendment coming to be known as the Hollis amendment would delay the enactment of this, play into the hands of the speculators and exploiters, that after all the prosecution under the bill when it becomes law will depend upon the district attorneys, and that instructions could go forward and would from the Attorney General's office to the various district attorneys, instructing them not to bring cases against workmen in contravention to the provisions of the Clayton law; that he believed it would be a wise thing to have the Hollis amendment presented and passed by the Congress as a separate measure after the food administration bill has been passed and become law.

"'I asked the Secretary whether we can count upon the assistance of the President in furtherance of such a bill. He said that the President would assist. Secretary Wilson then asked me whether I would help under these circumstances to remove any obstacle in the way of the enactment of the food-administration bill, and I said that I would.

"'At 1.45 the Secretary called me up over the phone and stated that he was called up by Senator Husting in regard to the provisions of the food bill and the provisions in the bill which would make strikes unlawful. The Secretary stated he had talked with me and he had an interview with the President, and the Senator expressed the view that he did not believe that the bill, when enacted, could be interpreted to apply to strikes of workmen, but that in any event the situation was such that the speculators had gotten ahead of the Government; that he believed it would be best for the bill to be enacted as it now stands and immediately pushed for passage, consisting of Senator Hollis's amendment. The Secretary told Senator Husting of the result of the talk with the President and with me, and that he believed that all objections would be removed to the passage of the bill, and he said he had already told him I would place no obstacle in the way of the passage of the bill with that assurance. He asked me whether that statement was correct, as he had made to Senator Husting, and I informed him that it was.'

"A conference held with Attorney General Gregory by Secretary Morrison and me brought forth the same information. The Attorney General said that he would write the district attorneys not to construe section 4 as interfering in any way with the normal activities of labor.

"The telephone talks between Secretary of Labor Wilson and me were corroborated effectively August 8 when Senator Husting, with whom the Secretary had conversed, told of the statement made by the latter. Senator Husting's statement later in the Senate August 8 also clinches the fact that the President of the United States was quoted correctly when the claim was made that he had indorsed the statement of Attorney General Gregory by saying:

"'That after all prosecution under the bill when it becomes law will depend upon the district attorneys, and that instructions could go forward and would from the Attorney General's office to the various district attorneys, instructing them not to bring cases against workmen in contravention to the provisions of the Clayton law.'

"During the debate in the Senate August 8 the following dialogue took place (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 6481):

"'Mr. HUSTING. * * * I voted for the Hollis amendment to the bill, which provided that the provisions of the bill should not be construed to prevent strikes or peaceful picketing or in any way amend or repeal the provisions of the Clayton Act. I would not favor the clause striking out this amendment if I thought it had that effect. I do not think it has that effect.

"'I was sufficiently interested, however, in the argument made by the Senator from New Hampshire and by arguments already made upon the legal effect of striking out the Hollis amendment to inquire from those who will have the administration of this law in their hands as to what construction would be placed upon it by them in the event that it became a law in its present form.

"'I am authorized by the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Wilson, to say that the administration does not construe this bill as prohibiting strikes and peaceful picketing and will not so construe the bill and that the Department of Justice does not so construe the bill and will not so construe the bill.'

* * * * * * *

"'Mr. REED. Will the Senator then say to us why the amendment, which would have removed any necessity for construction or any doubt, was stricken out?

"'Mr. HUSTING. I can not answer that question with authority, but I understand it was stricken out because it was not thought necessary or essential; that it had no effect whatever. I think it would have been wiser to have left it in, but it was stricken out. I understand, upon the argument that it could not legally be construed in that way and that it was surplusage or redundancy.

"'Mr. REED. Has the Senator talked with the Attorney General?

"'Mr. HUSTING. I will say that I have not. I have not talked with the Attorney General. However, I can say that the Secretary of Labor advised me that this was the opinion of the administration and the Department of Justice. He did not give it merely as a matter of belief on his part, but said that he was authorized to so state.

"'Mr. REED. Now, may I ask one further question? Suppose that a complaint should be filed in a court of the United States charging a violation of this act and that the case was lodged in court and the judge of the court should hold that under the charge made a violation of the law had occurred, is the Senator prepared to say to the country that the Attorney General has stated that under such circumstances as that he would nullify the law and undertake to control the court?

"'Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I can not say anything further than what I have already said. I do not presume any United States district attorney will prosecute any person under this law contrary to the interpretation placed upon the law itself by a superior officer.

"'Mr. LEWIS. * * * I am advised * * * that the provisions we placed in the Federal Trade Commission act in the closing days of its consideration * * * to the effect that there shall not be prosecution of farmers' organizations or members thereof or of labor organizations or members thereof for any of the acts to which we particularly addressed ourselves as criminal concerning commercial bodies, would exclude the prosecutions of which the Senator from New Hampshire had such a sincere fear.

"'Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, that is my belief, I will say to the distinguished Senator from Illinois; that is my view of it; and not only is it my view but, as I said before, it is the view of the administration, and I am advised is also the view of the Department of Justice and of every eminent and able attorney on the floor.'

"That a promise had been made that a separate bill embodying the amendment that the law should not 'modify or amend or repeal the Clayton Act' is established in the following statement made in the Senate August 8 (p. 6482, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD):

"'Mr. HUSTING. * * * But it appears here from the debate that many Senators have taken the view that this measure does not modify or amend or repeal the Clayton Act. So the action of many Senators and their votes will be based upon the assumption that it does not so modify, amend, or repeal that act, and the fact that others do think so will have no other effect than to put their opinion against the opinion of those who believe otherwise. * * * If there is any division of opinion here upon the question of what effect this proposed legislation will have on the antitrust laws, let a bill be introduced embodying the Hollis amendment, and let it go through both Houses, as I think it will without much opposition. Then all uncertainty will be swept away. But notwithstanding that this bill is not exactly as I would have it if I had the writing of it, it is necessary to pass this bill at once.'

"While the discussion over the Hollis amendment was at its height the Supreme Court gave an opinion in the case of the Paine Lumber Co. against Neal. It was held by the court that private individuals could not institute legal proceedings under antitrust legislation. This encouraged the officials of labor in the belief that the striking out of the Hollis amendment would not work to the injury of labor, as only the Government could institute prosecutions, and the Government had given assurance it would not. And, as the President and the Attorney General of the United States had said there would be no prosecutions by the Department of Justice, labor felt safe. This feeling was expressed by me in a telegram to Ernest Bohm, secretary of the Central Federated Union of New York, who had asked for information regarding the antistrike clause. The telegram said:

"'WASHINGTON, D. C., August 9, 1917.

"'American Federation of Labor did not delay passage of Food Administration measure for following reasons: Under the interpretation of United States Supreme Court in the case of the Paine Lumber Co. against United Brotherhood of Carpenters it was held that private individuals could not institute legal proceedings under antitrust legislation. Only the Government could take action. Sundry civil appropriation laws contain provisions that no appropriation for judiciary can be used to prosecute labor organizations under antitrust legislation. High authority has given assurance that section 4 of Food Administration act would not be interpreted to apply to normal and necessary activities of trade-unions. The proviso suggested by American Federation of Labor that section 4 should not be interpreted to repeal labor sections of the Clayton Antitrust Act will be introduced in Senate as a separate measure. This course has the approval of President Wilson, who will assist toward the enactment of proposed measure.'

"It thus will be seen that every avenue of information gave most emphatic assurances that trade-union normal activities would not be a violation of section 4. The promise to present a separate measure in the Senate providing that section 4 did not repeal the labor sections of the Clayton Act also had great influence in the decision of the labor officials to cease efforts for the amendment and give their whole attention to urging the passage of the Lever food-control bill.

"Besides, letters from Congressmen were being received daily. These were all favorable to the contention of labor. One of the many that were significant was from Representative SYDNEY ANDERSON, member of the Committee on Agriculture, which prepared the bill. He said:

"'It was, of course, never intended that any provision in the Lever bill should so operate as to repeal any part of the Clayton Act, and it was the opinion of those who drew the bill that it would not so operate.'

"Representative JOSHUA W. ALEXANDER, chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, in answer said:

"'As I read the bill there is nothing in it which is in conflict with the provision mentioned in your letter. That was the opinion of the House at the time the bill was under consideration, and for that reason the Keating amendment was defeated.'

"The assurances of the President of the United States through Secretary of Labor Wilson, Attorney General Gregory, the Council of National Defense, Food Administrator Hoover, Representative Lever, and others were accepted as conclusive. They had all been corroborated in Senate speeches by Senators Husting, CHAMBERLAIN, Hollis, and others. Labor ceased to insist that the bill should be amended and worked whole heartedly for the passage of the measure. Not a doubt existed that the assurances of the Government officials would be carried out.

"On Sunday afternoon, September 22, 1918, I delivered an address before the Trades Council of London, England. During the course of that address, referring to the strike of the London policemen which was then on, I said:

"'I am not criticizing the strikes. I am merely calling attention to the fact that here you have a law making such strikes illegal. In the United States we have defeated every proposition to make strikes illegal, and yet we are getting results for our people, and we are giving voluntary service.'

"A few weeks after the enactment of the Lever bill, in the convention of the American Federation of Labor held at Buffalo, N. Y., in November, 1917, the convention which the President of the United States addressed, the executive council of our federation, in submitting its report upon the question of the high cost of living and the Lever Act, among other things, said:

"'At the Baltimore convention of the American Federation of Labor, 1916, there were several resolutions introduced and adopted by the convention, directing that efforts be made by the officers of the federation to secure the passage of legislation which would insure relief from the high cost of living. These resolutions specifically demanded the creation of a Federal commission empowered to investigate all phases of the subject and recommend to Congress measures designed to remedy the abnormal conditions brought about since the inauguration of the World War, and also to prevent a recurrence of similar conditions in the future.

"'Other resolutions were passed the intent of which was to secure legislation authorizing an embargo upon the exportation of foodstuffs with a view to lessening prices in this country. The executive council at its January meeting had these resolutions under consideration and directed President Gompers to carry into effect, so far as possible, the purport of the convention action.

"'In accordance with the adoption of the resolution directing the executive committee of the American Federation of Labor to secure a Federal commission to investigate all phases of the subject, our efforts were directed in assisting to secure the passage of H. R. 4188, known as the food-survey bill, which passed Congress and became a law August 10, 1917.

"'Upon the designation by the President of Herbert C. Hoover as Food Administrator, a conference was called at the American Federation of Labor Building of representatives of the labor organizations having their headquarters in Washington, together with the representatives of the railroad brotherhoods and members of the labor group in Congress, as well as a number of sympathetic Congressmen. Mr. Hoover was invited to attend. At this meeting Mr. Hoover outlined his plans to meet the situation and urged that the American Federation of Labor give its support to the Lever bill, H. R. 4961, known as the food-control bill.

"'The federation gave its full support to the principles involved in this legislation, but suggested that the provision which said "That any person who conspires, combines, agrees, or arranges with any other person to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; to restrict the supply of any necessaries; to restrict the distribution of any necessaries; to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof, shall upon conviction thereof be fined not exceeding $10,000, or be imprisoned not more than two years, or both," be added to by the incorporation of an amendment declaring that the intent of this section was not to repeal any of the labor provisions of the Clayton law. It was feared that the language of this section might be construed to make it unlawful for workmen engaged in food transportation and production to strike.

"'An amendment was introduced for the purpose of safeguarding labor's interests in accordance with the above suggestion, and while Mr. Hoover stated that the section was not intended to prevent workmen from ceasing work, yet acquiesced in the amendment proposed and rendered valuable assistance in an effort to secure its adoption. Upon our failure to secure the adoption of this amendment, the matter was taken up through the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense. The Attorney General concurred in the view that the section was not intended to restrict the right of workmen to strike. As a further precaution, an arrangement was made whereby the Attorney General was to communicate with all of the attorneys representing the Government, informing them of his opinion and directing that no action be instituted against workmen engaged in the industries referred to for ceasing to perform labor.

"'During the period that the food-control bill was being considered by the administration the United States Supreme Court rendered its decision in the case of the Paine Lumber Co. against United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, in which the court decided that the conspiracy clauses of the Sherman law could not be made operative by a private party suing for an injunction against another private party or by one corporation against another corporation. The remedy for such a person or corporation is to apply to the Attorney General of the United States and have him institute a suit for injunction or restraining order.

"'Therefore, also in view of our successes since the first session of the Sixty-third Congress in having enacted and reenacted at each recurring session of Congress the prohibitory section of the appropriation provision in the antitrust section of the sundry civil act, whereby none of the money so appropriated can be used by Government officials to prosecute workers in their endeavors to increase wages, decrease hours, or improve working conditions under the general charge of conspiracy or restraint of trade under the Sherman Act, we felt that our position was sufficiently safe not to press further for similar legislation in the food-control bill.'

"At that same convention the President of the United States delivered an address in which he said:

"'While we are fighting for freedom we must see, among other things, that labor is free, and that means a number of interesting things. It means not only that we must do what we have declared our purpose to do, see that the conditions of labor are not rendered more onerous by the war, but also that we shall see to it that the instrumentalities by which the conditions of labor are improved are not blocked or checked. That we must do.'"

"DECEMBER 1, 1919.

"MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of November 23 to me was accompanied by a 'typewritten document' referring 'to the Lever act for food control when that act was in the making.' This you have requested me to carefully read and to give you my comments thereon, a request with which I feel bound to comply.

"I have read the document with care and with interest. I have no doubt that the extracts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the statement of the executive council of the Federation of Labor, the minutes of the executive council, the letter to the Members of Congress urging the adoption of your proposed amendment to the Lever bill, the meeting of the advisory commission and the Council of National Defense, telephone talks and memoranda which you made of them, telegrams, speeches, etc., are correctly set forth therein. Nor do I for a moment question that the conflicting announcements of yourself and former Attorney General Gregory are the sincere statements of two perfectly earnest and candid men, each of whom is acquainting the public with his recollection of an important fact. It is also equally evident to me that you acquiesced in the rejection of your proposed amendment to the Lever bill because of the incidents you have recited, supplemented by the decision of the Supreme Court in the Paine Lumber case. But it is equally true that the comments of Senators HOLLIS and CHAMBERLAIN, which I quoted a few days since, indicated a clear division of opinion regarding the effect of the bill upon existing laws.

"Your very ripe experience with legislation, both actual and prospective, must long since have impressed you with the fact that the opinions and even the purposes of legislators regarding bills for statutes are neither infallible nor controlling. Where ambiguities in a statute are patent the courts will sometimes consider them in the effort to ascertain the legislative intent, but as permanent guides they are more apt to lead one into divergent paths. The legislative intent being always important, contemporaneous legislative construction is a proper subject of judicial inquiry when that is in doubt, but not otherwise. But when, as with the Lever bill, this intent is clearly revealed by the language of the act there is no room for misapprehension. When that is true the phraseology of the lawmaker governs whatever he may have said about it before and when the law was enacted. Yet it must be said that the assurances given you regarding this law, while not binding upon the judiciary or even upon the Executive, have been respected until the coal strike carried that policy beyond the bounds of endurance. For if the Monthly Labor Review be a reliable authority, it may be stated that between the beginning of the war and the signing of the armistice there were 6,408 strikes, legal interferences with any of which was purely negligible. The President did on one occasion order strikers to resume work, they being in the employ of the Government. Unless my memory be at fault you did not object to this. In 4,201 of these the number of strikers aggregated 2,386,285. Our Expeditionary Forces comprised a grand total of 2,053,347, or 332,938 less than the number involved in about two-thirds of the strikes carried on at a time when the Nation's existence was in the balance and when every man on duty at home should have been as active at his task as were his brothers at the front.

"These workmen, many of whom were detailed for home work because of their skill in handicraft, and protected by privileged exemptions from general laws, were thus given immunity from responsibility during these terrible 18 months, although the need for their service was dire and the scale of their wage was the highest ever known. You may recall that in the summer of 1918 I sought by amendment to the second draft bill to suspend the exemption of the striker and send him to the front. But you opposed it, and with the vast influences behind you the doom of the amendment was sealed. Exempt from the laws and exempt from military duty, the Government bore with them and contrived to get along, thanks to that vaster body of faithful workingmen, who with their families now face a long, hard winter, with no reserves of coal, largely because you have indorsed a strike which your Government had condemned as 'unlawful.'

"I may be prejudiced. If so, it is unconscious; yet I have never been able to construe sections 6 and 20 of the Clayton Antitrust Act as much more than declaratory of existing law. Each confines immunity to legitimate acts and conduct, while section 20 merely recites the equity law of injunctions as it has existed for centuries. But in practice they have operated in harmony with your contentions until now. It is not surprising, therefore, that the experiences of five eventful years have convinced you of the exemption of organized wage earners and farmers from legal responsibility, and clothed them with privileges to be exercised on any scale whatever, and unmindful of consequences to society and to Government. Vested interests enjoyed similar immunity for many years, and with similar consequences. They finally confronted a long-suffering and aroused public opinion, which brought them to terms.

"You helped, and very greatly so, to make them realize in some degree their subjection to the governmental authority and their obligations to the people of this great country. If the coal strike shall prove to be the culmination of an equally despotic and oppressive tendency in the other direction, it will not have been a wholly unmixed evil.

"It can be defended under no provision of the Clayton Antitrust Act. It is the lawful carrying out of no legitimate object. The miners' organization is not in itself a conspiracy in restraint of trade. No one will so contend. But if the strike itself and its declared purpose is not such a conspiracy, then words have ceased to mean anything and human conduct must be measured by other standards than human experience. It proposes to force a general wage scale, accompanied by diminution of hours, without regard to consequences either to operator, consumer, or Government. Because of it men, women, and children may freeze, the lines of communication suspended, production paralyzed, and insurrection become rampant, but the leaders of 400,000 men, engaged in a basic industry and contending for immunity from all law, will have their way whatever the consequences to the remaining 110,000,000 of free Americans. And if other men shall dare to take their places in the coal mines, that coal may be dug and be distributed, war is to be waged upon them and upon their wives and children. This is a strike in name only. It is a vast upheaval, threatening alike the people and their institutions, a conspiracy depending for its success upon predetermined concert of action by a great organization.

"If the farmers of America similarly organized and claiming similar immunity should, in order to force the establishment of arbitrary prices for their products, refuse to till the soil, raise cattle and cotton, and war upon those who would do so in their stead, I am sure that you would think twice before giving their action the prestige of your benediction. Yet they have the same right, if right it is, now asserted by the united miners and defended by yourself. For one, I do not believe that 10 per cent of the miners of America have their hearts in this enterprise, or who do not know that it and similar ones can succeed only at the expense of free government, and of all that makes this country a fit place for freemen to live.

"The President therefore very properly declared on October 26 last that 'It is time for plain speaking. These matters with which we now deal touch not only the welfare of a class but vitally concern the well-being, the comfort, and the very life of all the people. I feel it my duty in the public interest to declare that any attempt to carry out the purposes of this strike and thus to paralyze the industry of the country with the consequent suffering and distress of all our people must be considered a grave moral and legal wrong against the Government and the people of the United States.'

"The gravity of the impending situation made it his imperative duty to add this solemn warning to his pronouncement: 'I can do nothing less than to say that the law will be enforced, and means will be found to protect the interests of the Nation in any emergency that may arise out of this unhappy business.'

"The vast majority of his countrymen realize the truth of his pronouncement, appreciate the need of the law's enforcement, and will support his efforts at protection with all their hearts and by every means in their power. This includes a vast preponderance of the wage earners of America.

"Let me here assert that had your proposed amendment to the Lever bill been incorporated into it, and thus made a part of it, the power and the duty of the administration to meet and overcome this emergency would not have been at all affected by it. This should be apparent from a moment's reflection.

"In the first place the coal strike finds no immunity in the Clayton Antitrust Act, as I have said. Hence the amendment could not have reached the difficulty. Moreover it could only have done so by placing a limitation upon the essential and constitutional powers of the Executive, which Congress can not do. And finally the Government possesses at all times the inherent power of self-preservation. When its sovereignty is assailed, either from without or within, when the people need its protection against assailants, external or internal, when its authority is defied, when law and order are disregarded, it would indeed be a contemptible government which could not or would not meet such emergencies with every power essential to its vindication and to the protection of its people. Whatever the consequence, said Lloyd-George three weeks ago, the Government is first and its authority must always be paramount.

"I am expressing no opinion as to the recent action of the United States district court of Indianapolis, for I have had no time to study the record. But as to the general proposition above stated, I have no doubt whatever. I could not entertain one and continue to respect and confide in the majesty of that Government to which we owe a common allegiance. It was once contended with much force by the people of an entire section of the country that the Government was powerless to preserve itself by coercing sovereign States back into the Union. They appealed to the debates of the Constitutional Convention and quoted the views of many illustrious statesmen of that era. But the issue was settled, let us hope, once and for all by the contest of 1861.

"The one serious challenge to this assertion is that it denies by destroying the right to strike, thus depriving the wage earner of his most efficient weapon for the enforcement of his just demands. This contention has been made so constantly and accepted so widely that it has become an axiom with organized labor, and naturally confuses the existence of a right with its improper exercise. But in common with the right of free speech, freedom of conscience, liberty, and even of life itself, its essential limitations exist and must be respected. Only so can the right survive.

"What is the right of strike? If it means the right of men to quit private employment individually or collectively, every one will concede it. No man can be made to work against his will in free America, except he becomes a vagrant or a convict. But the right to quit work essentially involves the corresponding right to continue at work, and one is just as sacred as the other. Government should not deny or diminish either. It should, if need be, sustain men in the exercise of both. Upon this proposition I think we agree.

"But beyond this point the divergence begins. The mere right to quit working does not define the organized wage earner's conception of a strike. That is purely negative and accomplishes nothing. What he understands and what he has been taught to understand by his leaders, by political parties, and candidates anxious for his vote, is that the strike is a weapon which he has the right to wield offensively or defensively in order to effectuate the purpose for which he invokes it. He may, in pursuance of it, disregard contracts, compel others to strike, prevent others from taking his place and continuing operations; he may destroy property and terrorize communities if by doing these things or any of them he may accomplish his object, even though it may rise to the dignity of a conspiracy against trade.

"He does not, it is true, openly avow his right to go so far as this, but in practice they feature every prolonged strike of any magnitude.

"The word itself implies force; violence lurks within it. Aggression is its synonym. Henry George, himself a trade-unionist than whom labor had no better friend nor abler champion, thus characterized the strike in a letter to Pope Leo XIII: 'Aiming at the restriction of competition—the limitation of the right to labor—its methods are like those of the army, which even in a righteous cause are subversive of liberty and liable to abuse while its weapon, the strike, is destructive in its nature both to combatants and noncombatants.' * * * 'Labor associations can do nothing to raise wages but by force. It may be force applied passively or force applied actively or force held in reserve, but it must be force. They must coerce or hold the power to coerce employers; they must coerce those among their own members disposed to straggle; they must do their best to get into their hands the whole field of labor they seek to occupy, and to force other workmen either to join them or to starve.' * * *

"We judge the strike by what we know it to be in practice. There it is war against competition. Woe to the man or the men who would take the place of the strikers. Quoting again from Henry George: 'They must do their best to starve workmen who do not join them; they must by all means in their power force back the scab as a soldier in battle must shoot down his mother's son, if in the opposing ranks, a fellow creature seeking work, a fellow creature, in all probability more pressed and starved than those who bitterly denounce him and often with the hungry, pleading faces of wife and child behind him. And in so far as they succeed, what is it that trades guilds and unions do but to impose more restriction on natural rights; to create "trusts" in labor to add to privileged classes other somewhat privileged classes; to press the weaker to the wall.' Mr. Foster says they must be 'exterminated like vermin.' We must not too severely denounce this policy, for it is the inexorable consequence of the denial to the citizen of the right to work when and as he will whether he affiliates with his fellows or not. The source of our present difficulties is the failure of Government to recognize and to vindicate this fundamental right, which no man of intelligence has ever publicly challenged, but to which all men have long been callously indifferent.

"This is the real menace of the coal strike, and is the element which invokes the interference of the Government. The miners may refuse to work and be within their constitutional rights; but while they so refuse, few men dare to continue mining and fewer to enter that field, however dire the necessity for fuel, because of the certain danger involved. They are sure to encounter the power of the national organization, to be expressed in terms of boycott, violence, assault, and murder. Without the protection of their Government, the industry is suspended. It is a basic one, and that spells the ultimate suspension of all dependent industries. Idleness, nonproduction, food and fuel scarcity, suffering, starvation, riot, lawlessness, and demoralization Nation wide in extent are the inevitable consequence. These affect us all, everywhere. It has become the Nation's business. It is its most insistent business. It will be effectually attended to whatever the cost and however we may differ regarding congressional discussions and departmental assurances.

"Meantime all, I trust, will perceive in the pending strike the futility of industrial warfare. It is expensive, destructive, estranging. Only by recognizing our reciprocal rights, duties, and obligations, and the essential of every element of society and economics to the whole, by the acknowledgment of our mutual dependence and its resulting sympathy, by the humane and cordial cooperation of employer, employee, manager, farmer, capitalist, and ruler for the common good can we solve the unhappy and deep-seated problems now surrounding us and maintain our high position in the civilized world. When passion, class antagonisms, and selfishness give way to the conviction that industrial war, whatever the immediate result, means mutual disaster, the sober common sense and enlightened judgment of the common people will peacefully but effectually solve our difficulties and tide us over all domestic crises. Civilization is not a creation but an evolution. It is the fruit of spontaneous cooperation continuing through centuries. Violence can destroy but can not promote it. Thrift and production are its corner stones. I trust the minds and consciences of all men may swiftly perceive these fundamental truths, compose their differences, and begin the old life anew.

"Very respectfully, etc.,

"C. S. THOMAS.

LETTER FROM HON. WILLIAM A. CLARK.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have a letter from Hon. William A. Clark, of Montana, a former Member of this body, written in reply to some charges made against some copper companies with which he is connected and other copper companies, growing out of certain transactions during the war with Germany. These charges were made by a subcommittee of a committee of the House of Representatives, and publicity has been given them by a report of the subcommittee. I am satisfied there is nothing to the charges and that they are unfounded. Senator Clark's letter completely refutes them, and, as he is a former Member of this body, I ask as a courtesy to him that his letter, herewith presented, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, November 20, 1919.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: There was recently filed a report by the House Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, of which the following statement was published with reference to the matter:

"Evidence indicating fraud involving millions of dollars in settlement of eight big war contracts of the War Department have been found by the House Committee on Expenditures in the War Department," etc.

Also, in the same dispatch, reference was made to the United Metals Selling Co., in which it was charged that salvage values were fixed by Government agents and Army officers on special facilities furnished by the Government, sometimes buildings and sometimes machinery and equipment, which were, in the opinion of the committee, insufficient and unjust to the Government.

It states also that in the case of the United Metals Selling Co. immense profits were made by the producers of copper by virtue of a combination of the low-price copper producers, which combination was aided and encouraged by the Government, although in violation of law.

The report states that in some of the cases cited the committee was of the opinion that constructive, if not actual, fraud occurred, and that millions of dollars were involved in the settlements made which the Government should recover if a proper investigation should be made.

It was not the United Metals Selling Co. alone that was interested, but all of the large copper producers, including the companies which I control, which were parties to the discussion with the Government agents as to the best manner to pursue in getting rid of the Government excess of copper, which was estimated to be about 200,000,000 pounds.

If the Government had contracted to sell this copper on the market, it would have resulted in a great depression in prices. Therefore an arrangement by all of the copper producers with the Government agents was consummated, to the effect that the copper producers would absorb the Government surplus at the rate of 5,000,000 pounds per month for a period of 10 months and 10,000,000 pounds per month for the subsequent 5 months.

The price to be paid the Government was to be the average price at which copper was sold during each month, when a settlement should be made. In this way the Government received the average price of copper and thereby avoided a great loss, which would have certainly resulted if they had attempted to sell the copper in any other manner. There was no profit whatever to the producers of copper, but they were willing to render assistance to the Government in helping it dispose of its stock without injury to the parties engaged in this great industry.

At the solicitation of both the Government and the copper producers, the United Metals Selling Co. undertook to represent both parties to the contract in attending to all of the details connected with the sales and payment to the Government, and this was done without any compensation or profit to the United Metals Selling Co.

You will thus observe that an injustice has been done to this company, and in case the matter should be further discussed in Congress I would be very glad if you would endeavor to set the matter right.

Yours, sincerely,

W. A. CLARK.

SEDITIOUS ACTS AND UTTERANCES.

Mr. STERLING. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3317.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to reserve the right to object. I would like to know what the bill is.

Mr. STERLING. The bill is entitled "An act to prohibit and punish certain seditious acts against the Government of the United States and to prohibit the use of the mails for the purpose of promoting such acts."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator withhold that just a moment that I may submit a report from the Committee on Commerce on H. R. 6857, to authorize the change of name of a steamer?

Mr. STERLING. If it will lead to no discussion, I will yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to ask unanimous consent to pass the bill, but I think it will lead to no discussion. It is recommended by the department.

Mr. STERLING. I yield for that purpose.

CHANGE OF NAME OF STEAMER.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I report back favorably without amendment from the Committee on Commerce the bill (H. R. 6857) to authorize the change of the name of the steamer Charlotte Graveraet Breitung to "T. K. Maher;" and I submit a report thereon (Rept. 314). I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed, upon the application of the owner, the Morrow Steamship Co., of Mentor, Lake County, Ohio, to change the name of the steamer Charlotte Graveraet Breitung, official number 27,665, to the "T. K. Maher."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SEDITIOUS ACTS AND UTTERANCES.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I now ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3317.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3317) to prohibit and punish certain seditious acts against the Government of the United States and to prohibit the use of the mails for the purpose of promoting such acts, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary without amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person to advocate or advise the overthrow, or to write, or knowingly to print, publish, utter, sell, or distribute any document, book, circular, paper, journal, or other written or printed communication, in or by which there is advised the overthrow, by force or violence, or by physical injury to person or property of the Government of the United States or of all government, or to advise or advocate a change in the form of government or the Constitution of the United States or resistance to the authority thereof by force or violence or by physical injury to person or property, or by force or violence to prevent, hinder, or delay or attempt to prevent, hinder, or delay the execution of any law of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the display or exhibition at any meeting, gathering, or parade, public or private, of any flag, banner, or emblem intended by the person or persons displaying or exhibiting the same to symbolize or indicate a purpose to overthrow by force or violence or by physical injury to person or property, the Government of the United States or all government, is hereby declared to be unlawful.

SEC. 3. That every document, book, circular, paper, journal, or other written or printed communication in or by which there is advocated or advised the overthrow by force or violence or by physical injury to person or property of the Government of the United States or of all government, or in or by which there is advocated or advised the use of force or violence or physical injury to or the seizure or destruction of persons or property as a means toward the accomplishment of economic, industrial, or political changes, is hereby declared to be nonmailable and the same shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize any person other than an employee of the Dead Letter Office duly authorized thereto or other person upon a search warrant authorized by law to open any letter not addressed to himself.

SEC. 4. That it shall be unlawful to import or cause to be imported into the United States or any place subject to its jurisdiction any matter declared by section 3 of this act to be nonmailable or to transport or cause to be transported any such matter from one State to another or into any place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

SEC. 5. That whoever shall use or attempt to use the mails or the Postal Service of the United States for the transmission of any matter declared by section 3 of this act to be nonmailable or who shall violate any other of the provisions of this act shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both, and if an alien shall be, upon the expiration of his sentence, deported from the United States and forever barred from reentering the United States or any Territory under its jurisdiction.

Mr. STERLING. I desire to offer one slight amendment. In line 8, on the first page of the bill, after the word "property," I move to insert a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Hale	Nelson	Sterling
Borah	Harris	Newberry	Sutherland
Calder	Johnson, Calif.	Norris	Swanson
Capper	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Thomas
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Townsend
Curtis	Kellogg	Phipps	Underwood
Dial	Keyes	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	King	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	La Follette	Reed	Williams
Fletcher	Lodge	Sheppard	Wolcott
France	McKellar	Smith, Md.
Frelinghuysen	Moses	Smoot
Gay	Myers	Spencer

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand, the subject matter before the Senate is Calendar No. 236, Senate bill 3317.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That bill has been considered in Committee of the Whole, amended, and reported to the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Secretary to state the amendment?

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 8, after the word "property," insert a comma.

Mr. BORAH. That is a very vital amendment. Section 3 of the bill reads as follows:

> That every document, book, circular, paper, journal, or other written or printed communication in or by which there is advocated or advised the overthrow by force or violence or by physical injury to person or property of the Government of the United States or of all government, or in or by which there is advocated or advised the use of force or violence or physical injury to or the seizure or destruction of persons or property as a means toward the accomplishment of economic, industrial, or political changes is hereby declared to be nonmailable and the same shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize any person other than an employee of the Dead Letter Office duly authorized thereto or other person upon a search warrant authorized by law to open any letter not addressed to himself.

Mr. President, we have been authorizing the Postmaster General to exclude from the mails certain printed material from time to time until we have established a complete consorship in the Post Office Department. Of course, what I have to say in objection to such a program has no reference to the person who holds the position of Postmaster General or who may hold that office in the future. It is based upon a principle that has nothing to do with individuals. It puts the party in the position of having his material, his printed matter, passed upon without any opportunity of being heard at all, and it places the Postmaster General, or his solicitor, I might say, because the solicitor runs the department so far as this matter is concerned and my experience goes, in a position of deciding what shall be mailable or nonmailable and how the party desiring to mail certain material shall obtain his right to do so; that is to say, how he shall conform any printed matter to the ideas of the Postmaster General. Now, I want to see some method provided by which there can be an open public hearing, where facts can be submitted and passed upon by an impartial tribunal. This bureaucratic system is intolerable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3288) to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield the floor?

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to take further time if the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] wishes to proceed with the consideration of the railroad bill. I am not in position, however, to consent to the passage of the particular measure which has been under consideration without some further discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The measure goes to the calendar, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, when the unfinished business was laid before the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I inquire who has the floor?

Mr. BORAH. I have yielded the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I wish to ask if the Senator from Iowa is disposed now to take up the unfinished business to the exclusion of the further consideration of the bill which has been under discussion? I agree with the Senator from Iowa that that is his right, and I stated I would not press Senate bill 3317 beyond the hour of 2 o'clock, but considering the stage at which we have arrived now I did not know but that he might consent to go ahead with the consideration of the measure which has been under discussion. I should be glad to hear the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] complete any statement he has to make in regard to it, and to hear any other Senator as well.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is quite evident that the bill which has just been under consideration will involve some discussion, and I feel compelled to insist upon the consideration of the railroad bill.

Mr. STERLING. Then if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield again.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask what will be the status of the bill which has been under discussion? Will it be in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has reached the Senate and the amendment has been concurred in. It goes to the calendar and when called up again will be in the Senate exactly as it was when the unfinished business was laid before the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. I understand it is amendable in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Amendments may be made in the Senate.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3288) to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Senate. After having spoken for a few minutes,

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. It seems to me a bill of the importance of this one should be considered when more than 8 or 10 Senators are present. I doubt if Senators knew that the chairman of the committee was going to discuss the bill. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Frelinghuysen	Moses	Stanley
Borah	Hale	Newberry	Sterling
Calder	Harris	Norris	Swanson
Capper	Johnson, Calif.	Nugent	Thomas
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Page	Townsend
Colt	Kellogg	Phipps	Wadsworth
Cummins	Keyes	Reed	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	King	Sheppard	Watson
Dial	La Follette	Simmons	Williams
Edge	Lodge	Smith, Md.	Wolcott
France	McKellar	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators are present—not a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BALL, Mr. FALL, Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. GAY, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts answered to their names when called.

Mr. POMERENE, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. ELKINS, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. CULBERSON entered the Chamber and responded to their names.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence, on account of illness, of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]; the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]; and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

I also desire to announce the absence of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] on account of illness in his family. I ask that these announcements may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] will proceed.

[Mr. CUMMINS resumed his speech. After having spoken, with interruptions, for nearly three hours he ended for the day.]

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 3, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 2, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, ever the same, increase our faith in Thee and strengthen our confidence in human nature, that amid the wild chaos which exists in the business, social and political life of our Nation, patience, perseverance, fortitude shall at last establish the normal, when we learn the difference between freedom and license, liberty and justice, truth and error.

Comfort the sorrowing, strengthen the weak, forgive the erring and hold us close to Thee in righteousness, truth, justice, mercy. In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization I ask unanimous consent that H. R. 10404 and the report thereon be recommitted to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 10404 be recommitted to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state what it is?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The bill is to amend sections 4, 8, and 10 of the act of June 29, 1906, as amended, relating to naturalization, to provide for a division of patrol guard in the Bureau of Immigration, and for other purposes.

Mr. GARRETT. Reserving the right to object, for what purpose does the committee desire to have it recommitted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The number of this bill is 10404. It is 148 on the Union Calendar, and the report on it is No. 457. It deals largely with matters of naturalization. As a result of inquiries made by the committee during the recess it is possible that the committee may want to change one or two of the naturalization paragraphs in the bill.

The bill has also one section attached to it relating to immigration matters—that is, a section providing for a border patrol—which carries with it no civil-service requirement, and there are other objections to it, so that the committee thought it would be better to look it over.

Mr. GARRETT. Was the original bill unanimously reported?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think it was.

Mr. RAKER. I will say to the gentleman that it was.

Mr. SABATH. There was no minority report on the bill.

Mr. RAKER. When the vote was taken on reporting the bill there was no vote against reporting it. It was a unanimous vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The request for recommitting the bill is unanimous except for 1 vote. We hope the bill may be back on the calendar within a very few days.

Mr. GARRETT. Who is objecting to it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The only objection comes from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX], and I am sure he has no objection to my so stating.

Mr. GARRETT. For the present, I object.

FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (S. 2472) to amend the Federal reserve act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up a conference report. Does the gentleman desire to have the conference report read?

Mr. PLATT. I ask to have the statement read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Let the report be read.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the conference report and statement, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill S. 2472, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 16: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the words "United States" insert the words "authorized by this section"; also strike out the figure "5" and insert "10"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 19: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the amendment except the word "but" and insert the following: "not engaged in the general business of buying or selling goods, wares, merchandise or commodities in the United States, and not"; also after the word "transacting" insert the word "any" and strike out the comma after the words "United States" and before the word "except"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "they" and insert in lieu thereof the words "it either directly or indirectly"; and the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 36: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 36, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Strike out the proviso at the end of the first paragraph, and insert a period after the word "corporations"; in the first line of the third paragraph insert after the word "institution" the words "principally engaged in foreign business"; and the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

To nearly all of the restrictions and limitations placed in the bill by the House the Senate conferees readily agreed, but in agreeing with some of them further amendments were submitted and agreed to by the House conferees, as follows:

On No. 14: The right to issue debentures, undoubtedly included in the power to borrow, was clearly set forth and limited in this amendment, which is further safeguarded by the insertion of the words "general conditions as to security and such," so that the amendment as agreed to will read: "to issue debentures, bonds, and promissory notes under such general conditions as to security and under such limitations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, but in no case having liabilities outstanding thereon exceeding 10 times its capital stock and surplus."

On No. 15: To this amendment was added a sentence further referring to the limiting of liabilities "of any and all classes" by the Federal Reserve Board.

On No. 16: The addition of the words "authorized by this section" in this amendment was made to conform with the restrictions upon deposits made above in the same paragraph, and the reserve required is raised from 5 to 10 per cent.

On No. 19: Most of the amendment inserted by the House is stricken out as unnecessary and possibly hampering to the successful operation of the financial corporations in competition with similar foreign institutions and with the great private banking firms. In certain South American countries control of trading companies through ownership of stocks is declared to be necessary, and there are certain other countries where American goods, raw materials, or machinery can not be safely sold on long-time credit unless a voice in the management of the properties during the period of the credit can be obtained. In receding from most of this amendment a further amendment was agreed to making certain that none of these subsidiary corporations should engage in the general business of buying and selling goods in the United States.

On No. 22: This amendment further strengthens the safeguards against attempting to control prices of commodities.

On No. 36: The proviso in the taxation paragraph is stricken out. This has reference to the taxation of shares owned by nonresidents.

In the third paragraph, first line, after the word "institution," the words "principally engaged in foreign business" are inserted to prevent a national or State bank of discount and deposit from being converted into an international banking or financial institution under the terms of this section.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to take any great amount of time in presenting this conference report. The bill has already been thoroughly discussed. I will, however, point out that the Senate conferees had pretty complete confidence in the House committee and in the action of the House. Of course the House committee gave the bill very full and complete study and consideration, adding many amendments, and it was fully discussed in the House. The Senate has receded on 26 amendments, while the House has receded on only 3. On seven amendments the Senate receded with further amendments.

The House receded on amendment No. 1. The word "principally" in line 9, page 1, comes out. It is not a matter of any consequence whether it is in or not, as far as I can make out, and we yielded on that, inasmuch as the Senate conferees wished us to do so.

Amendment No. 4 is with regard to the use of the word "federal," and the prohibition of the use of the word in the title of any other financial corporation of any kind, under penalty. We receded on that amendment, because of certain objections in the Senate, and also because of some objections that were made to it in the House during the debate. I am rather sorry that amendment went out, because it seems to me that the word "federal" was a good word to put into the titles of the corporations authorized by this act, and that it ought not to be used in the title of any financial corporation unless such corporation is organized under an act passed by Congress. Our attention was called to the fact that an insurance company had the words "Federal Reserve" in its title, and that they were apparently used for the purpose of creating the impression that it had some connection with the Federal Government or was organized under a Federal act. I do not know that that would deceive many people. The word "federal" is used by corporations now more or less. At any rate that amendment prohibiting the use of the word by outside corporations has been stricken from the bill.

We also struck out amendment 17. It has reference to establishing agencies but not branches in the United States. There was a good deal of discussion as to whether an agency and a branch were the same thing, and we finally struck it out, although personally I think institutions of this kind should be allowed not only agencies but branches, because they are to deal with people all over the country, and there is no reason why all of them should be located in New York City or some other seaport without branches or some means of doing business easily with people in other parts of the country. They are not national banks in the sense of banks of deposit. They do not compete with other national banks. Other national banks will take stock in them and cooperate with them. Consequently I can see no objection to having such agencies wherever they are needed. I think they would accommodate many people. But the matter seemed not of great enough importance to insist upon, and we yielded.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I yield to my colleague from Long Island.

Mr. HICKS. By striking out this amendment will these corporations be permitted to have correspondents outside of their home cities?

Mr. PLATT. It will put them on the same basis with national banks. National banks do have correspondents, and I suppose the law would be construed in the same way, probably.

Mr. HICKS. That will give them practically agencies to do whatever business they want to do outside of their own cities, will it not?

Mr. PLATT. Very likely. We have simply stricken out all reference to it, on account of the disagreement as to the terms that were used. I will refer to only one further amendment, the amendment numbered 22, which is to be considered in connection with No. 19.

Amendment numbered 19 has reference to the holding of stock of other corporations, and has been so amended in conference as to permit a finance corporation organized under this section to own stock in other corporations which may be engaged in buying and selling commodities outside of the United States, as well as stock in banking or finance corporations outside of the United States. In view of this extended power the committee decided to strengthen the paragraph prohibiting attempted monopoly or the control or fixing of prices by inserting the words "directly or indirectly," so that no corporation organized under this act could control or fix prices through stock ownership in any other corporation, or exercise any monopolistic control. This, of course, has reference to the United States.

Probably the words "United States" ought to be in the amendment, as we are not particularly concerned as to what these corporations may do in other countries so long as they comply with the laws of those countries. It seemed necessary to give them the right to hold stock in corporations doing a trade business in certain South American countries. It has been found unsafe to loan money to trading corporations in some places without some voice in their management. We have been told also that in certain European countries it is unsafe at present to loan money unless there was some element of control in the operations carried on. We do not want to hamper the institutions to be incorporated under this section so that they will be unable to compete with great private banks like J. P. Morgan & Co., Lee, Higginson & Co., who are not hampered. Everything we have permitted is under the regulation of the Federal Reserve Board. We have put in restrictions against monopoly and any practice that could be deemed against good banking and good finance.

The danger is, as I said when the bill was under debate, that we may have put in too many restrictions rather than too few. A question has been raised, I understand, by a national bank interested in export-trade financing, whether in prohibiting financial institutions organized under this section from dealing in commodities we have not made it impossible for them to make loans on commodities secured by shipping documents or warehouse receipts, since the ownership of the commodities might fall to the institution through failure to pay the loans. Of course, we have not so intended, and I do not see how anything in amendment 22 or in any part of the bill can be so construed. We have safeguarded the people, we have safeguarded the investor to the best of our ability, and we have endeavored to give the institutions every necessary power for financing and furthering our foreign trade. We see no reason why the bill should not speedily become a law.

I may say that since the adjournment of the last session of Congress it has been reported that one or two new corporations of this kind have been organized under State laws. As I said in debate before, there are eight or nine corporations doing principally a banking business that have been in existence for several years, in which national banks are subscribers under the amendment of the Federal reserve act passed in 1916, and some of them have become institutions of considerable size. But they are not engaged principally in financing exports on long-term paper. They are not organized to do anything but a banking business on short-term paper, mostly on acceptances, whereas the export finance corporations which we hope will be organized in considerable numbers under the bill when it becomes a law will take mortgages, bonds, or securities of that kind that will not mature for a number of years. It is only by taking such long-term paper that we can hope or expect to keep our export trade. Since the last session of Congress demand sterling exchange has fallen below $4, so that the English pound sterling, which we used to estimate roughly as worth $5, is worth only $4. Exactly what holds it there I do not know. England is beginning to manufacture for export, however, and her credit is good. With some other European countries the rates of exchange have gone very much lower, and are getting worse all the time. Apparently they have not reached a point where they can produce enough for their own people, to say nothing of a surplus for export. We do not claim that this bill, when it becomes a law, will immediately stabilize rates of exchange or that it will work any other miracles. It simply furnishes what we believe to be useful machinery for financing foreign trade, a trade more essential to our own prosperity than ever before, and more essential also to the war-worn countries of Europe.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time, and I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN].

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, this measure has gone through all of the stages of legislation up to the last. I think that the conferees on the part of the House have demonstrated their capacity to take care of the views of the House in the report that is before us. Out of 36 amendments I believe the House has yielded absolutely on 3, and the amendments upon which it yielded were amendments of no great material importance, with the exception of the one fixing the names of the corporations organized under this act.

Now, we have a regulation as to names as to all national banks belonging to the Federal Reserve System, and it seems to me desirable that there should be some regulation as to all of the banks organized under this Federal system, to wit, the national foreign exchange banks. However, the conferees have yielded on that, and I have no doubt but that the Federal Reserve Board, under the power conferred, will fix the names as they are authorized to fix them by regulation. But it should be uniform, and the term "Federal" is being used so much by corporations that are floating stocks of all kinds and is being abused to such an extent that there ought to be some legislation to exclude them from using it except by the consent of Congress. This measure is needed if it will accomplish what we desire. People who are purchasing products of this country and shipping them abroad are at a tremendous disadvantage at the present time.

The most common instance of that with which we are familiar in the South is the tobacco industry. We say cotton also, but cotton is purchased by people and held by people who are able to make the purchaser come here and buy it in dollars, and, while the price is shaded by conditions of exchange to-day, it is not as much affected as the exportation of tobacco. The tobacco man who buys tobacco on the markets of the Carolinas to-day for export, independent of the Tobacco Trust, purchases in competition with everybody. When he sells, he ships usually to London or Liverpool. Those are the common markets. He ships, and it is sold there by a commission merchant for pounds, shillings, and pence. The account is rendered, and the report is made to the man whose property is being sold that there are £10,000, we will say, to his credit on account of the sale of his cargo of tobacco, and he is told that he is authorized to draw at 60 days. Until recent years when he drew for £10,000 he got on the New York market immediately for that exchange around $4.84. To-day he gets $3.97 under the quotations this morning. On a £10,000 proposition he loses eighty-odd cents on every pound, or over $8,000 on the transaction. That, of course, is reflected in the price which he is able to pay at the warehouses of this country for tobacco, and if the provisions of this measure are followed up by organizations which are able to handle the exchange situations so as to give dollar credits in this country for people who are going to buy over there, and so as to handle the exchange of men in this country who are entitled to draw upon foreign institutions, and thus reestablish the ordinary exchange values, a tremendous advance in the price which the purchaser can pay for the products which he buys here for export will be brought about.

The same thing applies to wheat, and it applies in tremendous extent to the price that could be paid for the wheat of the western farmer if it can be bought and sold on exchange, which will again bring its normal value in this country. For that reason we of the Banking and Currency Committee have been very persistent and diligent in endeavoring to get this measure into operation at the very earliest practical moment, and I think that the bill is in as good shape as it is possible with the ordinary process of legislation to prepare a bill of this kind.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Arkansas begins, will he yield for just one question?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to know why the word "principally" was used in the ninth line on the first page. Is it intended to imply by that that this is not to be exclusively a foreign corporation, but that it is a domestic corporation as well?

Mr. WINGO. No; the truth of the matter is—and the gentleman asks a question that naturally occurs to anyone—that by the use of the word "principally" corporations would be given more latitude than if we do not use that word. The House recedes on that amendment, and I think we were wise in doing that. Receding on that amendment makes the act read that these "corporations are to be organized for the purpose of engaging in international or foreign banking or other international or foreign financial operations." We receded on the word "principally," because with that word stricken out we restrict the corporations to that class of business.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, the gentleman will excuse me, but I thought it was a word that was left in.

Mr. WINGO. No; the House receded. That brings me to a discussion of the philosophy of the House amendments. As the bill originally passed the Senate and came to the House there was a great deal of objection to it which I think was well founded. The principal fear was that these corporations might be engaged not entirely in purely foreign financial transactions, but that they might be developed as great trading corporations that would constitute a monopoly, which would affect injuriously the price of raw materials, such as the surplus farm products of the country or the surplus manufactured articles of the country, because these financial corporations controlling foreign credits might to a certain extent have some monopoly of the credits, and if we permitted them to become trading corporations, then, furnishing the credits to the European purchasers, they might restrict the financial aid they extend, the credits, by saying, "We will give you this credit provided you will purchase your copper, your corn, your cotton, your wheat, your manufactured articles through us."

The philosophy of the House committee was that we would restrict those corporations to purely financial transactions, and the House took up what was called the Gronna amendment, which is found on page 8 of the bill, and instead of the Gronna amendment the House wrote in a provision, and the Senate receded from its disagreement with an amendment, and I shall read the text of it as we agreed to it in conference:

No corporation organized under this section shall engage in commerce or trade in commodities except as specifically provided in this section, nor shall it directly or indirectly control or fix or attempt to control or fix the price of any such commodities. The charter of any corporation violating this provision shall be subject to forfeiture in the manner hereinafter provided in this section. It shall be unlawful for any director, officer, agent, or employee of any such corporation to use or to conspire to use the credit, the funds, or the power of the corporation to fix or control the price of any such commodities, and any such person violating this provision shall be liable to a fine of not less than $1,000 and not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment not less than one year and not exceeding five years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

With those and other restrictions and others appearing elsewhere in the bill we think we have removed the fears and the objections. I agreed to this bill, and I think it is necessary, because we are confronted with this sort of situation. It will serve no useful purpose to retail the conditions that exist in Europe. They have not the short current credits that before the war they used in paying for the surplus farm and manufactured products of the United States. They have long-term credits that the American exporter can not use, except the great corporations who could absorb and handle long-term paper, but which the producers of cotton, corn, wheat, and the small manufacturers could not accept in payment, so this act authorizes the creation of private corporations using private capital, which can issue its bonds that will be bought by the American investor, and thereby procure funds that are liquid and current and that will be acceptable to the producers of these surplus products in the United States. What was the alternative? Members will recall that there were a great many persons in this country—chief of whom was Mr. Wickersham, and he has a right to his opinion and I criticize only his judgment—who suggested that the foreign Governments of England, France, and Germany should undertake to guarantee the long-term paper of their people who desired to purchase their raw materials in the United States, and that our Government in turn should take this paper or guarantee it. In other words, that the United States Government go on extending financial aid not only to the Governments of Europe for the purpose of prosecuting the war but for the purpose of purchasing raw material for their industries to rehabilitate those countries.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to that proposition. I think the judgment of the country is against it. I think, further, the judgment of the country is that this Government has gone as far as it should go and as far as the allied Governments should ask us to go in aiding them by loans out of our Treasury. I am not only opposed to any further loans by our Government to our allies, but I am opposed to the proposition of extending the time of the payment of interest on the loans we have heretofore made them. For some time a propaganda has been going on, supported by certain men in the allied countries and seconded by certain gentlemen and newspapers in this country, for the purpose of having us to not only cancel the debt of our allies to us, but that we go further and join in a pooling of the war debts of the allied Governments, each nation to pay its proportionate share, based on its wealth and population, which would mean that we would not only lose the money we have already loaned, but that we would be compelled to assume the payment of billions of the war debt of our allies.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Can the gentleman give me some more time?

Mr. PLATT. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I want to be fair to the English, the French, and the Belgian Governments. I do not believe they have advanced any such proposal, and neither do I believe that they will. I think they are too fair and, if you please, too proud to make any such unreasonable demand upon the taxpayers of this Nation. However, I think it is time for us to serve notice upon the demagogues of those countries who are urging them to make such a demand, and upon the misguided individuals and newspapers of this country supporting the proposal, that Congress, backed by the American people, will not stand for any such proposition, but, to the contrary, the American people and Congress are going to not only oppose the pooling of the allied war debt, but we are opposed to extending the time of paying the interest upon the debts that they owe us. [Applause.]

But I repeat, Mr. Speaker, I want to be fair to these Governments, and for that reason I reaffirm my belief that they will not, and certainly Great Britain will not, ask us to extend the time of payment. The debt they owe us is a debt of honor, made in good faith, with a solemn promise to repay it according to the terms of the loan, and any failure upon the part of the allied Governments to scrupulously meet these obligations would be unfortunate, to say the least of it.

Congress, by the enactment of this foreign finance bill, serves notice upon the world that whatever aid America gives to the peoples of the allied countries in the future will not come from the United States Treasury, but such aid must come alone through the private corporations authorized to be created by this bill, which provides a machinery for meeting all the legitimate demands of Europe for financial aid upon business terms for the rehabilitation of her devastated lands and her destroyed industries. While the machinery is authorized by the Federal Government, the Government will not be responsible, and European industries, if they wish to procure financial aid from this country, must depend upon these private financial agencies and not upon the United States Treasury. I think it is time that the peoples of the allied countries understand that we expect them to put their own houses in order and go to work and, instead of asking us to release them from the debts they owe us and to assume the payments of a part of their debts, that they say to us, "We appreciate the aid you gave, we appreciate the charity of the Red Cross and the Young Men's Christian Association, but we do not expect any charity from the taxpayers of the United States."

If the peoples of the allied countries will give up the foolish and misguided idea that the United States Treasury is open to them, and instead will look only for credits upon business terms to the private corporations that are to be organized under this act, they will get every financial aid, viewed from a business standpoint, to which they are entitled and which will enable them, if they go to work, to rebuild their country and to make the money to pay us what they already owe us. If they are not willing to do this, then it is time for us to serve notice on them that we expect them to pay every dollar they owe us and the interest when due. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman recalls the statement made by a member of the Chamber of Deputies about two months ago, in which he claimed the United States would be required to pay its share of the war debt, that we have made money during the war, and that we would be under obligation to pay our share. Does that signify anything to the gentleman?

Mr. WINGO. I have not found in the debates, either of the Chamber of Deputies or in the House of Commons, a single man who occupied a responsible position in the Government who has made such suggestions. Now, the opponents of Lloyd-George's Government and the opponents of the Clemenceau Government are trying to play politics at home by urging and insisting that we join in a pooling of allied war debts. The gentleman will recall that at one time during the peace conference this question was discussed in the newspapers, and it was stated that neither of the allied Governments had made any such request or demand upon the representatives of the United States. I do not know how the executive officers of the Government feel on this question, and what I have said is not made by any authority of anyone connected with the executive branch, but it is made upon my own responsibility after consulting with Members on both sides of the aisle who agree with me that it is time to say to the demagogues of France and England and the misguided individuals in this country that their proposal for this Government to cancel our loans to our allies will not be given serious consideration by Congress.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WINGO. To a question.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman will recall that the member of the Chamber who made the statement was Jacques Stern. Now, let me ask the gentleman if there was any significance in the statement of Clemenceau that he desired to internationalize the war debt?

Mr. WINGO. I think that he is too shrewd a man to expect us to join in any such plan. I think he faces the verities of life, stripped of all its illusions, and recognizes that it is foolish to expect the taxpayers of the United States to pay one single dollar more toward the burden of the war than that which we ourselves have expended and which we ourselves owe.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. MASON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WINGO. My time has expired.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. MASON. I quite agree with the gentleman. I just wanted to know whether he had any information in regard to a statement which we read, that the Secretary of the Treasury is about to extend the interest due upon securities whereby the Government of the United States pays the interest and waits the convenience of those with whom we are associated?

Mr. WINGO. I will state to the gentleman that I have not discussed this matter with any of the executive officers of the Government. I have discussed it only with my colleagues on both sides of the House. I do not know what request has been made on our Government, nor do I know what the policy of the Secretary of the Treasury is on this matter. I personally admire Secretary Glass and have great respect for his judgment, but if he were to favor extending the time of the payment of interest on the debt of the Allies to us I should oppose it just as firmly as I would if he agreed with me. I simply speak for myself and those of my colleagues with whom I have discussed the matter.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know whether or not it has been the policy—in fact, the practice—of the administration to advance the money in the form of new loans with which to meet the interest obligations due from those countries?

Mr. WINGO. I am not discussing what our Government has done during the war; but we are getting out of the war now, and by this act we are setting up machinery ample to meet the future financial needs of the allied countries, and I am opposed to any further loans out of the Treasury to the allied Governments. I do not criticize the administration for doing what the gentleman suggested, because it had to meet the necessities of the war which required us to loan them the money to pay for war supplies bought in this country. If you did not approve it, you did not have the courage to stand on the floor and criticize the administration for doing the necessary obvious thing which Congress authorized the administration to do—that is, to extend loans to the allied Governments for that purpose to the extent of $10,000,000,000. But that is behind us, and the point I wish to make is, that this act is a reconstruction measure. By it we bring to an end the aid of the United States Treasury to the peoples of Europe and say that in the future we propose to meet their needs on a business basis, divorced from the United States Treasury. The bill specifically provides that the United States Government shall not be liable for any of the bonds or debentures that these corporations may issue, and provides a criminal penalty for anyone who represents, for the purpose of selling these bonds, that the Government is liable. I repeat that by this act Congress serves notice on the world that in the future our relations with the peoples of Europe will be on a business basis, and whatever aid they get from this country must be through these private agencies, and that henceforth the Treasury of the taxpayers will not be called upon for any further aid. [Applause.]

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important measure, and I have no desire to delay its passage in any way. Therefore I shall speak for only a minute or two. The bill as brought back from conference is substantially the bill as passed by the House. The changes are few, and, with one exception, I think, are not essential. There has been one change made which is somewhat important. I refer to the changes in the provisions which permit corporations organized under this bill, when it becomes a law, to hold stock in other corporations. We have given broader and more liberal powers to corporations in this respect. We have given the corporations to be organized hereunder certain greater latitude in their dealings abroad, but have endeavored to provide proper safeguards. As the bill came from the Senate originally there were very few safeguards in it, in my opinion. The House committee put numerous safeguards in, and was especially careful to avoid any opportunity for monopoly.

Again, as the bill comes from conference we have taken every reasonable means to avoid monopoly in the corporations organized under this bill. If I were writing the bill, I would make a change in one or two particulars; but every man has his own opinions or ideas as to legislation, and I am frank to say, in spite of one or two changes that I would like to see made in the bill, the bill is a good one; that it is well framed and well designed to accomplish its purpose. It is legislation that is of extreme importance. It ought to pass, and I expect it will pass in a few moments.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman allow one suggestion?

Mr. PHELAN. Gladly.

Mr. HICKS. It seems to me that on page 7, line 6, the word "not" in the beginning of the line is superfluous, and that in order to make that line conform to the amendment agreed to by the conferees the word should be stricken out.

Mr. PHELAN. It has been noticed and will be corrected at the proper time.

Mr. PLATT. I think the mistake is in the word "not." It occurs twice. It is printed in the amendment and ought not to be there.

Mr. HICKS. It repeats the word "not."

Mr. PHELAN. That has been taken note of and will be attended to.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the gravity of the question behind this bill would alone justify me in trespassing upon the time of the House when it is quite apparent that the measure is likely to receive approval. Yet some of the words spoken by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] prompt me to ask your indulgence long enough to point out that this measure goes beyond a simple business transaction and may help to meet the basic situation to which he has referred.

He has, I think, with wisdom, voiced the common opinion that as a Government it will be unwise for us further to make loans to foreign nations. But I should regret if we did not recognize the fact that Europe to-day is confronted by bankruptcy and that it may not be the part alone of charity but the part also of prudence for us to furnish some way of putting at the command of the starving, struggling peoples of Europe, with nerves wrecked by the war, with the best of their manhood hastened to early graves, in this hour of their crisis, the overflow, at least, of our resources. It is not necessary to put our facilities and products at their command in the method used during the war, but it is wise and prudent for humanitarian reasons, if for no others, to make it possible for those resources of ours to accrue to the salvation of lands in such perilous plight.

As a member of this committee, I confess that I viewed with some reluctance and misgiving the prospect of placing at the disposal of foreign nations, in our own time of stress, more of our resources. In matters of detail the bill has been safeguarded by most patient work on the part of the committee. Its administration has been put under complete control by the Federal Reserve Board, and on that score there can be no hesitation. But this broader question, the underlying question of extending our help to foreign lands, the gravest question perhaps that will immediately confront us in our foreign relations, might well give any Member of Congress pause, and he might well hesitate. Here we have attempted to bring to the solution of this momentous question the help of the wisest financiers of the land, those who will organize these corporations, and if we may not rely upon their judgment, their prudence, and their foresight, where shall we turn in time of perplexity? And because the measure intrusts the solution of this problem to these our wisest financiers, for one I think reluctance may be swept aside, and we may proceed in confidence that the interests of the people will be safeguarded; that the welfare of the country will be advanced; and that at the same time we shall meet the obligation common to-day to all humanity, the obligation of helping the struggling nations to survive. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to take further time in conclusion, except to say that I am glad the discussion has brought out to some extent the fact that the only alternative to such a measure as this is direct Government loans, which I believe we all think ought to be stopped.

This bill provides for a businesslike arrangement for corporations to be financed by private capital to do business on business principles. There is good security in European countries as well as in South America, and, of course, these corporations are not to do business exclusively with Europe, although there is where the crisis is. They are to do business all over the world. There are securities in the European countries, war-torn as they are, which are good if we can organize these corporations to use them and convert them into cash, to be used to pay wages in our factories and on our farms.

Mr. Speaker, the bill has been thoroughly discussed, not only now, but when it was before the House heretofore, and I now ask for a vote on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
2 December, 1919.

ANNUAL MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the annual message from the President of the United States, which was read by the Clerk of the House, William Tyler Page, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I sincerely regret that I cannot be present at the opening of this session of the Congress. I am thus prevented from presenting in as direct a way as I could wish the many questions that are pressing for solution at this time. Happily, I have had the advantage of the advice of the heads of the several executive departments who have kept in close touch with affairs in their detail and whose thoughtful recommendations I earnestly second.

In the matter of the railroads and the readjustments of their affairs growing out of Federal control, I shall take the liberty at a later date of addressing you.

I hope that Congress will bring to a conclusion at this session legislation looking to the establishment of a budget system. That there should be one single authority responsible for the making of all appropriations and that appropriations should be made not independently of each other, but with reference to one single comprehensive plan of expenditure properly related to the nation's income, there can be no doubt. I believe the burden of preparing the budget must, in the nature of the case, if the work is to be properly done and responsibility concentrated instead of divided, rest upon the executive. The budget so prepared should be submitted to and approved or amended by a single committee of each House of Congress and no single appropriation should be made by the Congress, except such as may have been included in the budget prepared by the executive or added by the particular committee of Congress charged with the budget legislation.

Another and not less important aspect of the problem is the ascertainment of the economy and efficiency with which the moneys appropriated are expended. Under existing law the only audit is for the purpose of ascertaining whether expenditures have been lawfully made within the appropriations. No one is authorized or equipped to ascertain whether the money has been spent wisely, economically and effectively. The auditors should be highly trained officials with permanent tenure in the Treasury Department, free of obligations to or motives of consideration for this or any subsequent administration, and authorized and empowered to examine into and make report upon the methods employed and the results obtained by the executive departments of the Government. Their reports should be made to the Congress and to the Secretary of the Treasury.

I trust that the Congress will give its immediate consideration to the problem of future taxation. Simplification of the income and profits taxes has become an immediate necessity. These taxes performed indispensable service during the war. They must, however, be simplified, not only to save the taxpayer inconvenience and expense, but in order that his liability may be made certain and definite.

With reference to the details of the Revenue Law, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will lay before you for your consideration certain amendments necessary or desirable in connection with the administration of the law—recommendations which have my approval and support. It is of the utmost importance that in dealing with this matter the present law should not be disturbed so far as regards taxes for the calendar year 1920, payable in the calendar year 1921. The Congress might well consider whether the higher rates of income and profits taxes can in peace times be effectively productive of revenue, and whether they may not, on the contrary, be destructive of business activity and productive of waste and inefficiency. There is a point at which in peace times high rates of income and profits taxes discourage energy, remove the incentive to new enterprise, encourage extravagant expenditures and produce industrial stagnation with consequent unemployment and other attendant evils.

The problem is not an easy one. A fundamental change has taken place with reference to the position of America in the world's affairs. The prejudice and passions engendered by decades of controversy between two schools of political and economic thought,—the one believers in protection of American industries, the other believers in tariff for revenue only,—must be subordinated to the single consideration of the public interest in the light of utterly changed conditions. Before the war America was heavily the debtor of the rest of the world and the interest payments she had to make to foreign countries on American securities held abroad, the expenditures of American travelers abroad and the ocean freight charges she had to pay to others, about balanced the value of her pre-war favorable balance of trade. During the war America's exports have been greatly stimulated, and increased prices have increased their value. On the other hand, she has purchased a large proportion of the American securities previously held abroad, has loaned some $9,000,000,000 to foreign governments, and has built her own ships. Our favorable balance of trade has thus been greatly increased and Europe has been deprived of the means of meeting it heretofore existing. Europe can have only three ways of meeting the favorable balance of trade in peace times: by imports into this country of gold or of goods, or by establishing new credits. Europe is in no position at the present time to ship gold to us nor could we contemplate large further imports of gold into this country without concern. The time has nearly passed for international governmental loans and it will take time to develop in this country a market for foreign securities. Anything, therefore, which would tend to prevent foreign countries from settling for our exports by shipments of goods into this country could only have the effect of preventing them from paying for our exports and therefore of preventing the exports from being made. The productivity of the country greatly stimulated by the war must find an outlet by exports to foreign countries and any measures taken to prevent imports will inevitably curtail exports, force curtailment of production, load the banking machinery of the country with credits to carry unsold products and produce industrial stagnation and unemployment. If we want to sell, we must be prepared to buy. Whatever, therefore, may have been our views during the period of growth of American business concerning tariff legislation, we must now adjust our own economic life to a changed condition growing out of the fact that American business is full grown and that America is the greatest capitalist in the world.

No policy of isolation will satisfy the growing needs and opportunities of America. The provincial standards and policies of the past, which have held American business as if in a strait-jacket, must yield and give way to the needs and exigencies of the new day in which we live, a day full of hope and promise for American business, if we will but take advantage of the opportunities that are ours for the asking. The recent war has ended our isolation and thrown upon us a great duty and responsibility. The United States must share the expanding world market. The United States desires for itself only equal opportunity with the other nations of the world, and that through the process of friendly cooperation and fair competition the legitimate interests of the nations concerned may be successfully and equitably adjusted.

There are other matters of importance upon which I urged action at the last session of Congress which are still pressing for solution. I am sure it is not necessary for me again to remind you that there is one immediate and very practicable question resulting from the war which we should meet in the most liberal spirit. It is a matter of recognition and relief to our soldiers. I can do no better than to quote from my last message urging this very action:

"We must see to it that our returning soldiers are assisted in every practicable way to find the places for which they are fitted in the daily work of the country. This can be done by developing and maintaining upon an adequate scale the admirable organization created by the Department of Labor for placing men seeking work; and it can also be done, in at least one very great field, by creating new opportunities for individual enterprise. The Secretary of the Interior has pointed out the way by which returning soldiers may be helped to find and take up land in the hitherto undeveloped regions of the country which the Federal Government has already prepared or can readily prepare for cultivation and also on many of the cutover or neglected areas which lie within the limits of the older states; and I once more take the liberty of recommending very urgently that his plans shall receive the immediate and substantial support of the Congress."

In the matter of tariff legislation, I beg to call your attention to the statements contained in my last message urging legislation with reference to the establishment of the chemical and dyestuffs industry in America:

"Among the industries to which special consideration should be given is that of the manufacture of dyestuffs and related chemicals. Our complete dependence upon German supplies before the war made the interruption of trade a cause of exceptional economic disturbance. The close relation between the manufacture of dyestuffs, on the one hand, and of explosives and poisonous gases, on the other, moreover, has given the industry an exceptional significance and value. Although the United States will gladly and unhesitatingly join in the programme of international disarmament, it will, nevertheless, be a policy of obvious prudence to make certain of the successful maintenance of many strong and well-equipped chemical plants. The German chemical industry, with which we will be brought into competition, was and may well be again, a thoroughly knit monopoly capable of exercising a competition of a peculiarly insiduous and dangerous kind."

During the war the farmer performed a vital and willing service to the nation. By materially increasing the production of his land, he supplied America and the Allies with the increased amounts of food necessary to keep their immense armies in the field. He indispensably helped to win the war. But there is now scarcely less need of increasing the production in food and the necessaries of life. I ask the Congress to consider means of encouraging effort along these lines. The importance of doing everything possible to promote production along economical lines, to improve marketing, and to make rural life more attractive and healthful, is obvious. I would urge approval of the plans already proposed to the Congress by the Secretary of Agriculture, to secure the essential facts required for the proper study of this question, through the proposed enlarged programmes for farm management studies and crop estimates. I would urge, also, the continuance of federal participation in the building of good roads, under the terms of existing law and under the direction of present agencies; the need of further action on the part of the States and the Federal Government to preserve and develop our forest resources, especially through the practice of better forestry methods on private holdings and the extension of the publicly owned forests; better support for country schools and the more definite direction of their courses of study along lines related to rural problems; and fuller provision for sanitation in rural districts and the building up of needed hospital and medical facilities in these localities. Perhaps the way might be cleared for many of these desirable reforms by a fresh, comprehensive survey made of rural conditions by a conference composed of representatives of the farmers and of the agricultural agencies responsible for leadership.

I would call your attention to the widespread condition of political restlessness in our body politic. The causes of this unrest, while various and complicated, are superficial rather than deep seated. Broadly, they arise from or are connected with the failure on the part of our Government to arrive speedily at a just and permanent peace permitting return to normal conditions, from the transfusion of radical theories from seething European centers pending such delay, from heartless profiteering resulting in the increase of the cost of living, and lastly from the machinations of passionate and malevolent agitators. With the return to normal conditions, this unrest will rapidly disappear. In the meantime, it does much evil. It seems to me that in dealing with this situation Congress should not be impatient or drastic but should seek rather to remove the causes. It should endeavor to bring our country back speedily to a peace basis, with ameliorated living conditions under the minimum of restrictions upon personal liberty that is consistent with our reconstruction problems. And it should arm the Federal Government with power to deal in its criminal courts with those persons who by violent methods would abrogate our time-tested institutions. With the free expression of opinion and with the advocacy of orderly political change, however fundamental, there must be no interference, but towards passion and malevolence tending to incite crime and insurrection under guise of political evolution there should be no leniency. Legislation to this end has been recommended by the Attorney General and should be enacted. In this direct connection, I would call your attention to my recommendations on August 8th, pointing out legislative measures which would be effective in controlling and bringing down the present cost of living, which contributes so largely to this unrest. On only one of these recommendations has the Congress acted. If the Government's campaign is to be effective, it is necessary that the other steps suggested should be acted on at once.

I renew and strongly urge the necessity of the extension of the present Food Control Act as to the period of time in which it shall remain in operation. The Attorney General has submitted a bill providing for an extension of this Act for a period of six months. As it now stands it is limited in operation to the period of the war and becomes inoperative upon the formal proclamation of peace. It is imperative that it should be extended at once. The Department of Justice has built up extensive machinery for the purpose of enforcing its provisions; all of which must be abandoned upon the conclusion of peace unless the provisions of this Act are extended.

During this period the Congress will have an opportunity to make similar, permanent provisions and regulations with regard to all goods destined for interstate commerce and to exclude them from interstate shipment, if the requirements of the law are not complied with. Some such regulation is imperatively necessary. The abuses that have grown up in the manipulation of prices by the withholding of foodstuffs and other necessaries of life cannot otherwise be effectively prevented. There can be no doubt of either the necessity or the legitimacy of such measures.

As I pointed out in my last message, publicity can accomplish a great deal in this campaign. The aims of the Government must be clearly brought to the attention of the consuming public, civic organizations and state officials, who are in a position to lend their assistance to our efforts. You have made available funds with which to carry on this campaign, but there is no provision in the law authorizing their expenditure for the purpose of making the public fully informed about the efforts of the Government. Specific recommendation has been made by the Attorney General in this regard. I would strongly urge upon you its immediate adoption, as it constitutes one of the preliminary steps to this campaign.

I also renew my recommendation that the Congress pass a law regulating cold storage as it is regulated, for example, by the laws of the State of New Jersey, which limit the time during which goods may be kept in storage, prescribe the method of disposing of them if kept beyond the permitted period, and require that goods released from storage shall in all cases bear the date of their receipt. It would materially add to the serviceability of the law, for the purpose we now have in view, if it were also prescribed that all goods released from storage for interstate shipment should have plainly marked upon each package the selling or market price at which they went into storage. By this means the purchaser would always be able to learn what profits stood between him and the producer or the wholesale dealer.

I would also renew my recommendation that all goods destined for interstate commerce should in every case, where their form or package makes it possible, be plainly marked with the price at which they left the hands of the producer.

We should formulate a law requiring a federal license of all corporations engaged in interstate commerce and embodying in the license, or in the conditions under which it is to be issued, specific regulations designed to secure competitive selling and prevent unconscionable profits in the method of marketing. Such a law would afford a welcome opportunity to effect other much needed reforms in the business of interstate shipment and in the methods of corporations which are engaged in it; but for the moment I confine my recommendations to the object immediately in hand, which is to lower the cost of living.

No one who has observed the march of events in the last year can fail to note the absolute need of a definite programme to bring about an improvement in the conditions of labor. There can be no settled conditions leading to increased production and a reduction in the cost of living if labor and capital are to be antagonists instead of partners. Sound thinking and an honest desire to serve the interests of the whole nation, as distinguished from the interests of a class, must be applied to the solution of this great and pressing problem. The failure of other nations to consider this matter in a vigorous way has produced bitterness and jealousies and antagonisms, the food of radicalism. The only way to keep men from agitating against grievances is to remove the grievances. An unwillingness even to discuss these matters produces only dissatisfaction and gives comfort to the extreme elements in our country which endeavor to stir up disturbances in order to provoke governments to embark upon a course of retaliation and repression. The seed of revolution is repression. The remedy for these things must not be negative in character. It must be constructive. It must comprehend the general interest. The real antidote for the unrest which manifests itself is not suppression, but a deep consideration of the wrongs that beset our national life and the application of a remedy.

Congress has already shown its willingness to deal with these industrial wrongs by establishing the eight-hour day as the standard in every field of labor. It has sought to find a way to prevent child labor. It has served the whole country by leading the way in developing the means of preserving and safeguarding lives and health in dangerous industries. It must now help in the difficult task of finding a method that will bring about a genuine democratization of industry, based upon the full recognition of the right of those who work, in whatever rank, to participate in some organic way in every decision which directly affects their welfare. It is with this purpose in mind that I called a conference to meet in Washington on December 1st, to consider these problems in all their broad aspects, with the idea of bringing about a better understanding between these two interests.

The great unrest throughout the world, out of which has emerged a demand for an immediate consideration of the difficulties between capital and labor, bids us put our own house in order. Frankly, there can be no permanent and lasting settlements between capital and labor which do not recognize the fundamental concepts for which labor has been struggling through the years. The whole world gave its recognition and endorsement to these fundamental purposes in the League of Nations. The statesmen gathered at Versailles recognized the fact that world stability could not be had by reverting to industrial standards and conditions against which the average workman of the world had revolted. It is, therefore, the task of the statesmen of this new day of change and readjustment to recognize world conditions and to seek to bring about, through legislation, conditions that will mean the ending of age-long antagonisms between capital and labor and that will hopefully lead to the building up of a comradeship which will result not only in greater contentment among the mass of workmen but also bring about a greater production and a greater prosperity to business itself.

To analyze the particulars in the demands of labor is to admit the justice of their complaint in many matters that lie at their basis. The workman demands an adequate wage, sufficient to permit him to live in comfort, unhampered by the fear of poverty and want in his old age. He demands the right to live and the right to work amidst sanitary surroundings, both in home and in workshop, surroundings that develop and do not retard his own health and well-being; and the right to provide for his children's wants in the matter of health and education. In other words, it is his desire to make the conditions of his life and the lives of those dear to him tolerable and easy to bear.

The establishment of the principles regarding labor laid down in the covenant of the League of Nations offers us the way to industrial peace and conciliation. No other road lies open to us. Not to pursue this one is longer to invite enmities, bitterness, and antagonisms which in the end only lead to industrial and social disaster. The unwilling workman is not a profitable servant. An employee whose industrial life is hedged about by hard and unjust conditions, which he did not create and over which he has no control, lacks that fine spirit of enthusiasm and volunteer effort which are the necessary ingredients of a great producing entity. Let us be frank about this solemn matter. The evidences of world-wide unrest which manifest themselves in violence throughout the world bid us pause and consider the means to be found to stop the spread of this contagious thing before it saps the very vitality of the nation itself. Do we gain strength by withholding the remedy? Or is it not the business of statesmen to treat these manifestations of unrest which meet us on every hand as evidences of an economic disorder and to apply constructive remedies wherever necessary, being sure that in the application of the remedy we touch not the vital tissues of our industrial and economic life? There can be no recession of the tide of unrest until constructive instrumentalities are set up to stem that tide.

Governments must recognize the right of men collectively to bargain for humane objects that have at their base the mutual protection and welfare of those engaged in all industries. Labor must not be longer treated as a commodity. It must be regarded as the activity of human beings, possessed of deep yearnings and desires. The business man gives his best thought to the repair and replenishment of his machinery, so that its usefulness will not be impaired and its power to produce may always be at its height and kept in full vigor and motion. No less regard ought to be paid to the human machine, which after all propels the machinery of the world and is the great dynamic force that lies back of all industry and progress. Return to the old standards of wage and industry in employment are unthinkable. The terrible tragedy of war which has just ended and which has brought the world to the verge of chaos and disaster would be vain if there should ensue a return to the conditions of the past. Europe itself, whence has come the unrest which now holds the world at bay, is an example of standpatism in these vital human matters which America might well accept as an example, not to be followed but studiously to be avoided. Europe made labor the differential, and the price of it all is enmity and antagonism and prostrated industry. The right of labor to live in peace and comfort must be recognized by governments and America should be the first to lay the foundation stones upon which industrial peace shall be built.

Labor not only is entitled to an adequate wage, but capital should receive a reasonable return upon its investment and is entitled to protection at the hands of the government in every emergency. No government worthy of the name can "play" these elements against each other, for there is a mutuality of interest between them which the government must seek to express and to safeguard at all cost.

The right of individuals to strike is inviolate and ought not to be interfered with by any process of government, but there is a predominant right and that is the right of the government to protect all of its people and to assert its power and majesty against the challenge of any class. The government, when it asserts that right, seeks not to antagonize a class but simply to defend the right of the whole people as against the irreparable harm and injury that might be done by the attempt by any class to usurp a power that only government itself has a right to exercise as a protection to all.

In the matter of international disputes which have led to war, statesmen have sought to set up as a remedy arbitration for war. Does this not point the way for the settlement of industrial disputes, by the establishment of a tribunal, fair and just alike to all, which will settle industrial disputes which in the past have led to war and disaster? America, witnessing the evil consequences which have followed out of such disputes between these contending forces, must not admit itself impotent to deal with these matters by means of peaceful processes. Surely, there must be some method of bringing together in a council of peace and amity these two great interests, out of which will come a happier day of peace and cooperation, a day that will make men more hopeful and enthusiastic in their various tasks, that will make for more comfort and happiness in living and a more tolerable condition among all classes of men. Certainly human intelligence can devise some acceptable tribunal for adjusting the differences between capital and labor.

This is the hour of test and trial for America. By her prowess and strength, and the indomitable courage of her soldiers, she demonstrated her power to vindicate on foreign battlefields her conceptions of liberty and justice. Let not her influence as a mediator between capital and labor be weakened and her own failure to settle matters of purely domestic concern be proclaimed to the world. There are those in this country who threaten direct action to force their will upon a majority. Russia today, with its blood and terror, is a painful object lesson of the power of minorities. It makes little difference what minority it is; whether capital or labor, or any other class; no sort of privilege will ever be permitted to dominate this country. We are a partnership or nothing that is worth while. We are a democracy, where the majority are the masters, or all the hopes and purposes of the men who founded this government have been defeated and forgotten. In America there is but one way by which great reforms can be accomplished and the relief sought by classes obtained, and that is through the orderly processes of representative government. Those who would propose any other method of reform are enemies of this country. America will not be daunted by threats nor lose her composure or calmness in these distressing times. We can afford, in the midst of this day of passion and unrest, to be self-contained and sure. The instrument of all reform in America is the ballot. The road to economic and social reform in America is the straight road of justice to all classes and conditions of men. Men have but to follow this road to realize the full fruition of their objects and purposes. Let those beware who would take the shorter road of disorder and revolution. The right road is the road of justice and orderly process.

Senator ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
Washington, D. C.:

Following resolutions unanimously adopted at regular meeting of Davenport Post, No. 26, last evening. Please reply:

Whereas four members of the American Legion of Centralia, Wash., were wantonly murdered by representatives of a lawless and un-American element on November 11, 1919; and

Whereas it is evident that the sentiment which promoted this appalling crime exists and is propagated at large, and that we must expect other demonstrations against the Government and its defenders; and

Whereas, further, it is possible now for radical leaders to impress with their doctrines many who are true at heart, but whose minds are restless as a result of postwar reaction and the unsettled condition of affairs: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Davenport Post, No. 26, American Legion, supporting its desire to uphold the Government in any emergency and to make this country a better place in which to live, demands that the Congress of the United States enact legislation to encourage unalloyed Americanism and to fittingly punish any individual or organization whose tenets endanger the welfare of the many law-abiding citizens of this country and the future of these United States.

Resolved further, That these resolutions be transmitted by telegram to Senators CUMMINS and KENYON and to Congressman HULL, urging them to prompt and fearless action in this connection, and asking them to reply as to their attitude, and that a copy of these resolutions be sent to National and State headquarters, to Grant Hodge Post, No. 17, Centralia, Wash., and to the Davenport newspapers for publication.

DAVENPORT POST, No. 26, THE AMERICAN LEGION.

DAVENPORT, IOWA, December 2, 1919.

Hon. ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The following resolution was adopted by Davenport Post, American Legion, at its regular meeting, Monday, December 1:

Whereas the United States Government has reached a decision in the coal situation; and

Whereas the comfort, health, and life of our families and all other people of the United States is being imperiled due to the lack of coal: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, First, that this post is not primarily concerned with the disputes between capital and labor; that its concern is mainly in the upholding of the Constitution of the United States and the constituted authority of the Government as set forth in the persons who represent that authority, either State or National; second, that this post tenders to the State of Iowa and to the United States of America its unqualified support and cooperation in the existing emergency, whether it may be threatened either by the operators or by the miners, and in maintaining and preserving the essential principles of American institutions based upon and contained in the Constitution and laws of the United States of America; third, that if the operators immediately open their mines and the miners return to work at once this post will use its every influence to see that a governmental investigation is made of operators' profits, miners' wages, and the cost of coal to the public, and that a speedy and fair readjustment of the entire coal situation be effected; fourth, that a copy of this resolution be sent to the governor of the Commonwealth of Iowa, our Senators and Representatives, and the interested national officers at Washington. The State headquarters of the American Legion further request that the State headquarters be requested to notify the naional headquarters and all Iowa posts of the action taken by this post and ask that they take similar action.

DAVENPORT POST, AMERICAN LEGION.

Mr. BECKHAM. I present resolutions adopted by the American Legion of Louisville, Ky. I ask that they be read.

There being no objection, the resolutions were read as follows:

AMERICAN LEGION OF KENTUCKY (INC.),
Louisville, Ky., November 26, 1919.

Hon. J. C. W. BECKHAM,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed resolution, adopted by the State executive committee of the American Legion of Kentucky, is transmitted to you by direction of that committee, urging your most serious consideration of the matters referred to therein.

Respectfully,
D. A. SACHS, Jr.,
Department Adjutant.

Resolved, That the American Legion of Kentucky sees clearly the destructive agencies at work on our soil to bring about the downfall of our Government, our institutions, and our civilization, with the determination that they shall not succeed; and as a measure in aid of contravention, our Senators and Members of the House of Representatives are now urged to realize that Americanization is now the one great issue, to stand steadfastly by the principles of the fathers, and to support by their influence, advocacy, and votes proposed legislation to give the utmost power to the Department of Justice in dealing with propagandists, I. W. W. individuals and organizations, Bolshevists, and aliens.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present a telegram in the nature of a memorial from St. Johns Post, American Legion, St. Augustine, Fla., and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire the telegram read?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is very brief, and it might as well be read.

THE LABOR PROBLEM.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have here a letter from former Gov. Leslie M. Shaw, afterwards Secretary of the Treasury, making some suggestions regarding certain of our problems of labor legislation, which I deem of sufficient importance to have inserted in the RECORD. I therefore ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOVEMBER 24, 1919.

Senator CHARLES S. THOMAS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR THOMAS: I have noted with great satisfaction and admiration your independence in crises and am disposed to send you the major thoughts of a speech I recently made in Baltimore. I have since seen the same ideas expressed by others, and am constrained to believe them worthy of legislative consideration.

We both recognize, I think, that Americanism is face to face with the most dangerous foe it has ever encountered. Shall an organized minority dictate to an unorganized majority? That is the issue of the hour, and, but for the resiliency of the American people under pressure, there would be slight hope for the future. More than once an organized minority has wrecked a State, but never before has the issue been directly presented to the American people.

The ranks of organized labor seem to be divided, but the division is only seeming. The two factions are working for identically the same end—absolute control of America. The conservatives, led by the president of the American Federation of Labor, seek victory through kind words, diplomacy, and stealth. The radicals, more honest and more brave, prefer an open fight, with its attendant bloodshed. Grant what either element of organizer labor demands and there will be little left beneath the flag which the fathers called liberty. Allow the same men to control iron and steel workers, coal miners, railway operatives, not to mention the thousand other industries, and less than 100 ambitious labor leaders can and will starve and freeze 100,000,000 liberty-loving, but liberty-forsaking, Americans into abject obedience. Put the radical element of labor unionism in control and it will confiscate all property. The conservative element will content themselves with the confiscation of earnings. The one will kill the goose; the other will appropriate only her eggs.

I am disposed to believe it will be better for America if the reds and their deluded sympathizers control the American Federation of Labor. Then, and then only, will the American people appreciate the situation as it actually exists. Nothing less will awaken them, and it seems to me better to settle the issue now, when all the world is similarly tormented, than to defer it until other nations are prepared to monopolize the industries of the world while we welter.

Fundamental justice is the basis of liberty, and the maintenance of liberty is the only justification for organized society. Liberty implies that each shall have the right, and also the chance, to work when he pleases, as many hours a day as he pleases, and for anyone with whom he can make an acceptable engagement. Aptitude, industry, and efficiency should each be recognized as an element for reward.

No man must be forbidden to associate himself with others engaged in the same enterprise, nor required so to do in order to secure employment. No one must be either a victim of or a participant in violence, threats, blacklists, or boycotts. Each must have the right to quit temporarily or permanently, and his employer must have the reciprocal right to suspend or discharge.

Liberty also implies that each may have an agent to represent him, especially if he considers himself incompetent to sell his own services. And it follows that he must either fulfill his contracts or respond in damages. It no more implies that every man who contributes labor in diversified industries and enterprises may have the same representative than that every man who contributes capital to diversified enterprises may have the same representative. Either would spell monopoly. Permit all corporations and copartnerships to be represented by a single agency and our priceless liberties would vanish. Permit all labor unions to be represented by the offices of a single federation of labor and the same result follows.

The foregoing is elementary and relates primarily to employer and employed. But the public have rights second to none in importance, and therefore the public must be heard, and the public must bear responsibility.

What are these public rights and responsibilities, and how shall they be safeguarded and exercised? Under normal conditions the public have the right to demand that established industries shall be operated continuously. Exceptions arise only when the continuance will work irreparable damage or impose undue hardships upon some essential factor in its prosecution. This brings us to the difficult but not impossible task of providing a method by which public interests may be conserved without prejudicing individual rights.

If a tribunal of national jurisdiction were created, or if some one of the many commissions now in existence were given powers as broad and analogous to those possessed by the league of nations—that is to say, with authority to initiate inquiries—and subject to be invoked by either party to an existing or threatened labor dispute, and, pending investigation and reports, strikes and lockouts were forbidden, I think no one could justly claim that his liberties had been encroached.

But how can the findings, the recommendations, and decisions of such a tribunal be enforced? Frankly, let me say, I do not believe they can be enforced without encroaching fundamental liberty—individual sovereignty, if you please—any more than war can be prohibited without encroaching national sovereignty. Thus the decisions and recommendations of this suggested tribunal would be on an exact par with those of the league of nations. Therefore strikes and lockouts would be permissible following a decision of the commission, with a fixed but brief period intervening, exactly as war is permitted after a definite period following a recommendation of the league of nations.

You and I agree that the men who contribute labor are in no degree superior and, before the law, in no respect inferior to those who contribute capital. Those who contribute capital are permitted to combine, and such combinations we call corporations and copartnerships. Those who contribute labor must be permitted also to combine. These combinations we call unions. But exactly as corporations and copartnerships are forbidden to confederate, so labor unions should be similarly restricted. The one safeguards the public by prohibiting conspiracies in restraint of trade. The other would safeguard the public by prohibiting conspiracies in restraint of production and transportation. It would effectually avert industrial paralysis by circumventing cumulative and sympathetic strikes. It would, in short, preclude conspiracies to levy tribute upon the public as the price of their liberties. Liberty can not be purchased with gold. Our liberties were purchased with blood, and, though it may be remotely necessary to defend them in the same way, it always will be unwise to attempt to purchase them of or to compromise them with an organized minority, be that minority composed of bankers or manufacturers or railroad owners or farmers or laborers.

Think of it, Mr. Senator! The labor unions only claim a total membership of four millions—relatively an insignificant per cent of the men whose hands show honest toil. You and I know that fully one-half of these have been urged or coerced into joining. Their better judgment told them they could do better for themselves than any representative would be likely to do for them so long as the representative insisted that no one should do more or better work or receive a higher wage than the poorest and most inefficient. They chafe not a little with the knowledge that they have no voice unless they echo that of their leaders. Many of them recognize that their officers are simply ambitious of power and therefore seek to establish a labor caste from which there shall be no escape either for themselves or their children. Their leaders oppose every method of profit sharing, home owning, all welfare work, and seldom, if ever, assist a member to individual advancement. The efforts of their officers and leaders are solely in behalf of the class. Collectivism is their creed, individualism their pet detestation.

Give the membership of the labor unions a chance and they will hurl their self-appointed leaders overboard and reorganize with a purpose to encourage individual efficiency and to secure for each member the greatest possible advancement with only the sky to limit his hope and his aspiration. A very large per cent of the membership must recognize that the settled policy of the unions, as now officered, to restrict production leads only to disaster. They are not fools. They are simply misled. They are patriotic, like other men, and under proper leadership will recognize freedom to toil for an adequate reward as among the great blessings and will welcome the opportunity to rear their children in an atmosphere of hopefulness.

The courts have held that labor is not a commodity. Neither is capital a commodity. Labor can not be hoarded; capital can be; and both are at all times subject to the inexorable law of supply and demand. Your dollars have the right to combine with my dollars in the manufacture of steel through a corporation known as the United States Steel, for instance, and we may do anything short of a breach of the peace to advance the earnings of our dollars. But the public good demands that our combined dollars must not confederate with associated dollars similarly working in the Bethlehem Steel. Likewise, you and I, when employed by either of these big concerns, must have the right to combine and form a union and do anything we can to advance the price of our labor. But we have no just cause to complain if forbidden to confederate or conspire with men similarly employed by the other big concern or with men engaged in other industries.

No organized minority, by threats of starvation, freezing, or otherwise, can coerce an unorganized majority so long as their activities are restricted to the one concern or corporation where employed, any more than an organized minority of men who contribute capital for a corporation can coerce the public when similarly restricted. Those who contribute capital for the New York Central Railroad are not permitted to confederate with those who contribute capital for the Pennsylvania road, and both are expressly prohibited by statute from engaging in the production of commodities like coal and from confederating with any producers of freight. Those who contribute labor in the operation of these railroads are in no degree better nor a whit worse, and are entitled to no less and to no greater rights and privileges.

Americans who furnish labor and voluntarily cooperate with other Americans who furnish capital are entitled to demand and are bound to concede an exact parity of responsibility to the public. In bankruptcy proceedings, as in popular sympathy, labor can have and does have preference, but within the realm of responsibility and at all times before the law, in peace no less than in war, there can be no preferred class. Any special demand upon or exemption to those who contribute labor or to those who contribute capital is un-American, and, if practiced, will undermine the most priceless boon of organized society—Anglican liberty.

Sincerely, yours, LESLIE M. SHAW.

DEPARTMENTAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, upon a number of occasions my attention has been called to alleged activities of employees or persons in various departments of the Government in behalf of the American Federation of Labor, and to efforts being made to secure the adherence of employees of the Government to that organization. I am in receipt of a letter from a young man who was a lieutenant in the Army and who after leaving the Army took employment in the War Department. He invites my attention to this condition; and I should like the permission of the Senate to read a few sentences from his letter. He states:

When I was honorably discharged from the Army, where I held a commission as a first lieutenant, on account of financial reasons I took the very first place offered me, which was a temporary clerk in one of the numerous War Department offices.

Now, I am a Bostonian and a former member of the Boston Stock Exchange, and occupied a rather unique position in that before I entered the Army I had practically always been in business for myself.

I had hardly got seated at my desk, and before I could be taught what my duties were, a person came over to me and asked me if I belonged to the union.

I asked him to explain, when he said that the Government clerks had a union affiliated with the Federation of Labor.

I told him I did not approve of labor unions, that I could not belong to anything where "strike" was a weapon, when he said the strike clause was eliminated.

I told him I would not join, when he said, "If you wish to get ahead, you must join the union."

I told him I did not think so, and if I could not get ahead I would get out, which I did in a few weeks.

I do not make any claim that they made it unpleasant, but I do think that if you wish any slight favors the union person gets them.

My whole reason for not joining was that no person can have two masters. I could not reconcile my mind that while in the Government service that it was necessary for me to belong to any union.

Then he discusses the matter further, and says:

My wife is now with the Government and refused to join the union, although some pressure is brought to bear, but not enough really to make a complaint.

But you can rest assured that if a subhead is a member of the union and he has a few persons under him, that when the time comes he gets the worst of it, when any favors are passed around, for not belonging to the union.

Mr. President, I refrain from expressing any opinion at this time as to whether or not Federal employees should be permitted to affiliate with any organization other than such as may be formed by themselves for proper and legitimate purposes. There is a well-grounded feeling in the United States that police officers and others who may be engaged in preserving peace and enforcing the law ought not to be permitted to join labor organizations or other organizations which in any manner might interfere with the discharge of their duty to the municipality or to the State. It is very clear in my mind that police officers should not become affiliated with outside organizations. The unwisdom of such a policy was clearly demonstrated in Boston.

And I do assert that it is highly improper for the departments of the Government to permit Government employees or third persons to engage in efforts during office hours and within the Federal buildings to secure the adherence of employees to any organization. I understand that employees of the Government have their own organizations. It is quite likely these organizations serve useful and beneficial purposes, but it would be inimical to the public service if promotion or advancement of employees depended upon their joining or failing to join such organizations. It manifestly is improper for employees of the Government to promote the growth of such organizations during office hours or to infringe on the time which they should give to the Government to engage in activity to increase the membership thereof. And the impropriety would be greater of the department heads permitting persons not employees of the Government to visit the departments for the purpose of soliciting employees to become members of any organization. It is inconceivable that the heads of departments would allow employees to make statements such as those which the writer of the letter just read attributes to the person who visited him. If promotion or advancement in the Government service is dependent upon membership in some organization, then some course will be taken to prohibit employees of the Government from becoming members of such organization. The heads of the various departments and bureaus and agencies of the Government should examine into this matter and take such steps as are necessary to protect those in the employ of the Government and to secure efficient and proper service by Government employees.

TREATY OF PEACE.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, while at home last week I prepared and published two interviews supporting reservations to the peace treaty and the league of nations. I ask unanimous consent that they may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the interviews were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Atlanta Journal.]

INTERVIEW WITH SENATOR SMITH OF GEORGIA ON THE PEACE PACT AND ITS EARLY RATIFICATION.

RESERVATIONS REQUIRED to Americanize the treaty, to preserve the constitutional power of Congress to pass upon important questions growing out of the treaty, rather than leave their decision to one man in Switzerland.

OUR BOYS MUST NOT BE DRAFTED to execute mandates or for the wars of the world unless Congress from time to time approves.

RATIFICATION URGED WITH RESERVATIONS.

"I have had many expressions of appreciation for my interview of last Monday on the treaty of peace and league of nations, and requests for a more detailed discussion of proposed reservations.

"I would greatly enjoy presenting them face to face to my constituents, but the Senate meets on Monday, and I must be in Washington to urge prompt action.

"The treaty of peace with Germany, including, as it does, the league covenant and the provision for an international labor organization, fills a book of 192 pages. It can hardly be expected that many out of public life have had time to study it thoroughly.

"In any study of the league covenant, it should be borne in mind that the original draft prepared by President Wilson was not used, but the draft by Gen. Smuts, a British subject from South Africa, was made the basis of the covenant.

"At the hearing before the Foreign Relations Committee a copy of the original plan of President Wilson for a league covenant was introduced. He had with him in Paris two specialists on international law, Messrs. Miller and Auchincloss, of New York. Their comments upon the President's plan are also printed in the reports of the Foreign Relations Committee.

"Let me say, at the outset, that I regard the original plan prepared by President Wilson as vastly better than the Smuts plan, and the original plan of the President, with the changes suggested by Messrs. Miller and Auchincloss, would have been far more in accord with our institutions than the Smuts plan, which has been attached to the German treaty.

MAKE WAY TO WITHDRAW CLEAR.

"I call attention now to reservations that should be adopted:

"First. The covenant provides that any nation, upon giving two years' notice, can withdraw from the league, if the nation has fulfilled all its 'international obligations and obligations under the covenant.' The covenant fails to say who shall determine whether the nation desiring to retire has fulfilled all its obligations. If this question is to be passed upon by the council or the assembly, then, under the provisions of the covenant, it would require unanimous approval by the council or the assembly. This would be awkward and might become the cause of dispute.

"We in the United States must still remember that a dispute over the right of secession can produce war. It produced four years of war among the States of the Union.

"In the interest of peace to prevent future disputes and complications we insist upon a reservation declaring that the United States will be the sole judge of whether it has performed all its obligations under the covenant, in case it gives notice for withdrawal.

RESERVE DOMESTIC QUESTIONS AND IMMIGRATION FROM CONTROL BY THE LEAGUE.

"2. Under the terms of the covenant, it is not at all clear that the council of the league can not pass upon domestic problems. The covenant is very broad in its provisions placing within control of the council all matters of dispute. It is true that in article 15 it is provided if one of the parties claims that the dispute arises out of a matter, which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of the party, and the council so finds, then the council will take no action with reference to the dispute. There is no clear rule of international law distinguishing domestic from international problems.

"Mr. Wells, the English writer, has insisted that the league should pass upon the treatment of 'Armenians in Turkey and negroes in Georgia.'

"The problem which confronts the United States, most likely to involve our country in a serious war, is Asiatic and Japanese immigration. The covenant almost invites the Japanese to raise this issue with us before the council. If no reservation is made it creates a serious and threatening menace, making peace doubtful and war probable.

"I shall never forget the power with which Senator Bacon impressed this question upon the Senate during the winter of 1912, when he urged to our treaty with Great Britain a reservation excluding from arbitration domestic questions and naming immigration and the treatment of emigrants specifically as domestic questions, which we would not submit under any circumstances to arbitration.

"A reservation should be attached to ratification expressly providing that domestic problems will not be submitted to the league, and that immigration is a domestic problem which we will retain exclusively for our own control.

RESERVE TO CONGRESS THE RIGHT TO ACCEPT MANDATORIES.

"3. The league covenant provides that members of the league shall assume supervision of other countries or peoples, the control to be conducted under what is termed 'mandatories.' The plan is for the country accepting a mandatory over another country to police the country, preserve order, establish a system of government, and gradually help the country to a state of progress where self-government may be possible. A mandatory can not be forced upon a member of the league, but must be accepted by it. The question arises, Who can accept a mandatory for the United States? Remembering again that it is the Smut's plan for the league covenant that has been attached to the German treaty, the language may fairly be construed in connection with the English form of government.

"In Great Britain the ministry conducts all foreign relations without submission to Parliament. They are, however, immediately under the control of Parliament at all times on account of the fact that if Parliament ceases to sustain the ministry the ministry retires and a new ministry is appointed.

"Under the covenant our representative in the council, who will sit in Switzerland 3,000 miles away from the United States, may have authority to accept for the United States a mandatory, and place upon the United States the burden of handling and policing a foreign country.

"The mandatory suggested for us is the Turkish Empire. We are advised by telegraphic reports that our Army officers who investigated conditions in Turkey reached the conclusion that it would require an army of 250,000 of our soldiers in Turkey.

"There are about 15,000,000 Turks. They are Mohammedans. There are about 70,000,000 Mohammedans in Asia and Africa. They have an established record for courage and ability to fight. I certainly would be unwilling to see a smaller army than 250,000 men undertake the task. To put in a smaller army would invite their slaughter. It would probably take 10 years to establish a permanent condition of law and order in the Turkish Empire. The cost would approximate a billion dollars a year. Are the people of the United States ready to assume such a responsibility? Do the mothers and fathers wish their boys drafted to be sent on such an errand?

AGAINST ONE-MAN POWER.

"I do not undertake to pass upon the question, but I do insist that no such power should be given to one man in Switzerland, and that no doubt should be left about the fact as to what can and what can not be done by our representatives in the council.

"I favor reservations limiting the authority of our representative in the league council by congressional direction, and I urge a reservation expressly declaring that no mandate shall be placed upon the United States, or accepted for the United States, unless Congress, by joint resolution, approved by the President, accepts the mandate. Indeed, as to all of the reservations which I am supporting, the main purpose is to preserve in Congress the powers which the Constitution meant Congress to perform and to prevent those powers from being transferred to a council 3,000 miles away, with only one citizen of the United States and eight foreigners making up the council. Surely no one can claim that either of the three reservations so far suggested would lessen the effective work of the league.

GUARD OUR EXPORTS FROM INTERFERENCE.

"4. The German treaty provides for a reparation commission of five, from Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and the United States, to supervise German financial conditions. This commission can control exports to and from Germany.

AS TO EXPORTS.

"A number of us insist that a reservation should declare that the reparation commission shall have no power to interfere with exports from the United States to Germany or imports from Germany to the United States.

"Ours is a great raw-material producing country. Our associates on the reparation commission are buyers of raw material. It would simply be stupid for our country to agree that the raw-material buying nations should have the privilege of shutting off the export trade of the United States to middle Europe. Bringing the question down to the immediate interest of the people of this section, it would be stupid to permit the cotton-buying nations represented on the reparation commission to stop our export of cotton into middle Europe. As drawn without reservation, it would be a constant menace, with power to cut off a 3,000,000 bales market annually from our cotton.

"My special interest in this reservation is the protection of the raw-material producers of the United States against unfair treatment by the reparation commission, and I cordially favor a reservation declaring that this reparation commission shall not interfere with the business of the United States without the consent of our Government.

"Surely this reservation does not lessen the value of the league.

RESERVATION TO PROTECT UNITED STATES AGAINST ENGLAND'S 6 VOTES TO OUR 1.

"5. Under the league covenant Great Britain and her colonies have 6 votes in the assembly while the United States has only 1. It has been claimed that the assembly has no authority. Article 3 of the covenant provides: 'The assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.' The assembly passes upon the admission of additional nations to the league. The league began with nine members, five of whom are permanent and four temporary. Article 4 provides with reference to the temporary members of the council: 'These four members of the league shall be selected by the assembly from time to time, in its own discretion.' Article 15 provides: 'That any dispute brought before the council may be transferred to the assembly at the instance of either party to the dispute.'

"I do not mean to question the importance of the council. I only cite the above to show the importance of the assembly. I believe it only fair to our country that a reservation should be adopted declaring that the United States assumes no obligation to be bound by action in the assembly, in which a member of the league and its self-governing dominions or colonies cast more votes than those cast by the United States.

"The United States has a larger white population than any other member of the league. It has greater wealth, and it will be called upon to contribute more to the league than Great Britain and her colonies. Can anyone object to a reservation that at least places the United States upon a basis of equality with Great Britain, where the interests of the United States may be involved?

INTERNATIONAL LABOR ORGANIZATION.

"6. Part 13 of the treaty provides for an international labor organization. It would require more space than one communication should occupy to discuss in detail the intricate provisions of the plan for this organization.

"It is reliably stated that the scheme originated with the Berne conference of European labor leaders, many of whom were Socialists. It has also been shown that they even insisted that action by this international labor council should have the force of legislation, binding upon the nations parties to the league. As it is, vast powers are given to the body of delegates who are to assemble under the provisions creating the labor organization. They have the right to cite a nation to appear and defend itself if it fails to comply with action by their organization. Part 13 provides for the publication of a paper by the international organization, to be printed in various languages and distributed through the nations members of the league, and the expense to be borne by the nations members of the league.

"The labor leaders of Europe teach doctrine antagonistic to our form of government. In their original scheme for equality of conditions for labor throughout the world they would pull down the condition of the laboring man in the United States to equalize it with labor far less favorably situated.

"I voted for a reservation declaring that the United States declined to participate in the organization provided for in part 13, unless Congress should hereafter determine that the United States should enter the organization. I believe this reservation to be wise. It may be we will find less danger later on from becoming a part of this organization. At present it offers no benefits to any citizen of the United States, and much probable injury.

RESERVATION LEAVES ARTICLE 10 AS INTERNATIONAL LAWYERS AIDING PRESIDENT LEFT IT.

"7. I come now to article 10. Article 10 reads as follows:

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

"It is interesting to note how the present article 10 abandons the great principle of justice contained in the original provision presented by the President. In the President's original covenant contained in the testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee article 10 was article 3, and reads as follows:

"'The contracting powers unite in guaranteeing to each other political independence and territorial integrity; but it is understood between them that such territorial readjustments, if any, as may in the future become necessary by reason of changes in present racial conditions and aspirations or present social and political relationships, pursuant to the principle of self-determination, and also such territorial readjustments as may in the judgment of three-fourths of the delegates be demanded by the welfare and manifest interest of the peoples concerned, may be effected if agreeable to those peoples; and that territorial changes may in equity involve material compensation. The contracting powers accept without reservation the principle that the peace of the world is superior in importance to every question of political jurisdiction or boundary.'

"It will be observed at once that in the plan of President Wilson, while the members of the league were to guarantee to each other political independence and territorial integrity, it was with the express understanding that territorial readjustments were to be made, pursuant to the principle of self-determination. Members of the league were to accept, without reservation, the principle that the peace of the world was more important than political jurisdiction and boundaries. This simply meant that our four great allies, England, France, Italy, and Japan, ruling, as they do, more than one-fourth of the peoples of the world, held by them as subjects, were to concede to these peoples the right of self-determination, and yield their political jurisdiction for the peace of the world.

THE PRESIDENT QUOTED.

"On January 25, at a session of the peace conference in Paris, the President declared:

> We are here to see that every people in the world shall choose its own masters and govern its own destinies, not as we wish but as they wish. We are to see, in short, that the very foundations of this war are swept away. * * * Those foundations were the holding together of the empires of unwilling subjects by the duress of arms, and nothing less than the emancipation of the world from these things will accomplish peace.

"Instead of carrying out through section 10 the principle laid down by the President in his original article 3 and in this address, article 10 practically binds the subject nations to servitude, and we have the assurance of President Wilson that this will bring war and not peace. Article 10 without a reservation obligates the United States to furnish our boys to practically every war throughout the world, and the military bill submitted by the department for the approval of Congress revives all the draft laws of the last war in case the United States becomes involved in another war.

"Our country may obligate itself to respect the rights and independence of all members of the league. We should not assume now an obligation to preserve them; that is to say, successfully defend them against external aggressions.

"The aggression might be partly external and partly internal, still we must furnish our boys for the struggles all over the world. In case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council is to advise us of the number of men, the battleships, and the financial contribution which our country must make.

MUST NOT PLEDGE OUR BOYS TO THE WARS OF THE WORLD.

"We should not create any obligation binding upon future Congresses to enter all the wars provided for in article 10 without any knowledge of the circumstances with which they may be surrounded or the principles which may be involved.

"It is claimed that article 10 will prevent war in the future. A hundred years ago we had an alliance of England, France, Germany, Austria, and Russia. It was called a league for peace. It was so powerful that it was believed war would be brought to an end, but it was not long before the members of the league quarreled among themselves and war followed.

"Press dispatches show that war is now going on in Arabia. Hedjaz is a member of the league. Press dispatches advise us that a number of Arabian tribes have invaded Hedjaz and are threatening the holy city of Mecca. Under article 10, if we were in the league, the council would advise us what troops we must send to Arabia to help drive the Arabian tribes out of Hedjaz. From what I can learn of the strength of the Arabians probably 50,000 men would be our quota. Ought the Senate of the United States agree to mortgage our boys for all the wars that may come?

THE SENATE RESERVATION.

"We will preserve the provision of article 10 which requires each nation to respect the rights of other countries, and the council will advise us of conditions from time to time, but the Congress of the United States must be left free to enter or decline to enter the wars of the world, and the reservation which the Senate adopted upon this subject is as follows:

"'The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which under the Constitution has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.'

RESERVATION AS PERFECTED BY THE PRESIDENT'S INTERNATIONAL LAWYERS.

"In complete answer to the claim that this reservation seriously affects the value of the league I call attention to the fact that Messrs. Miller and Auchincloss advised President Wilson to make the article just what it will be with the proposed reservation. Their suggested substitute for the President's article 10 was in the following language:

> "Each contracting power severally covenants and guarantees that it will not violate the territorial or impair the political independence of any other contracting power.

"They advised that the respective nations should obligate themselves to respect but not to preserve the territorial and political integrity of members of the league.

OTHER RESERVATIONS.

"There are other reservations intended to retain in Congress control of the conduct of our representatives in the league 3,000 miles away, in Switzerland. They in no way affect the authority of the league, and no serious objection has been urged to them.

"There is a reservation with reference to the Monroe doctrine and one with reference to Shantung the language of which ought to be modified, and I believe an agreement can be made for their modification.

"The introductory resolution of ratification of the Lodge resolutions is objectionable for the reason that our resolution of ratification should bring the war with Germany to an end, and there is no necessity for formal acceptance by other nations.

TREATY'S VALUE PRESERVED—ONLY DANGER REMOVED.

"The resolutions which I have urged do not in any way affect the covenant, except to preserve in Congress the responsibility placed by the Constitution. The change in article 10 is only to leave Congress entirely free to act when we are called upon to send our boys to the wars of the world.

"Ample provisions in the covenant for the investigation of disputes, for arbitration, for agreement to delay wars, and even for economic boycotts are unchanged.

"The President has declared that article 11 was his favorite in the treaty. That article is untouched. The President declared when he received the degree conferred by the University of Paris that the power of the league of nations was to be its 'moral force.'

"No reservations I support will in any way lessen this power.

"I urge an immediate ratification of the treaty with reservations, because I hope that the league may be instrumental in helping quiet the disturbed condition of Europe, and because I deem it of great importance to close our treaty of peace with Germany under the terms embodied in the present instrument.

"It will not be necessary with the reservations I have discussed to send the treaty back to Germany, and no formal approval by our associates in the war against Germany is necessary.

"The League for Peace, of which ex-President Taft is president, has issued an address urging ratification with substantially these reservations. It is inexcusable to seek from it partisan political advantage, and such an effort can not succeed."

NIAGARA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 3427) to establish a commission to report to Congress on the practicability, feasibility, and place, and to devise plans for the construction of a public bridge over the Niagara River from some point in the city of Buffalo, N. Y., to some point in the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

I will state that I am reporting the bill on a poll of the committee. The bill expressly provides that the Government shall be at no expense, and it creates no obligation upon the part of the Government. I can see no objection to its passage, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration, together with the amendment suggested in the body of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The amendment was, on page 1, line 4, before the words "Public Bridge Commission" to insert "Buffalo," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission be, and hereby is, created to be called the Buffalo Public Bridge Commission.

SEC. 2. That such commission shall consist of the following-named persons: Frank B. Baird, Edward J. Barcalo, Marcus Barmon, Frederick G. Bagley, Emanuel Boasberg, Col. Charles Clifton, John W. Cowper, William A. Eckert, Louis A. Fischer, Carmelo Gugino, Charles M. Heald, Edward B. Holmes, Allan I. Holloway, Edgar E. Joralemon, Charles B. Kane, Edward Kener, John A. Kloepfer, Stanislaus Lipowicz, Edward P. Lupfer, James H. McNulty, Jacob J. Siegrist, John W. Van Allen, John G. Wickser, Floyd M. Wills, and Frank Winsch.

SEC. 3. That the commission shall inquire into the practicability, feasibility, and estimated expense of the construction of a public bridge, from some point in the city of Buffalo, N. Y., over the Niagara River, to some point in the Dominion of Canada, and devise a plan for the construction of such bridge and the manner of financing its construction.

SEC. 4. That the commission is authorized as a whole, or by subcommittees of the commission duly appointed, to hold sittings and public hearings and to take testimony of experts and others, but without creating any expense or obligations to the United States thereby.

SEC. 5. That said commission may report to Congress its findings and recommendations and submit any testimony taken from time to time, and shall make a final report, accompanied by any testimony not previously submitted, not later than two years after the approval of this act, at which time the term of this commission shall expire, unless it shall have previously made its final report, and in the latter case the term of the commission shall terminate with the making of its final report.

SEC. 6. That such commission be, and it hereby is, empowered to adopt rules and regulations for the conduct of the business of the commission.

SEC. 7. That this act shall take effect on the day following its approval.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATE PAGES.

Mr. CALDER. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back favorably without amendment Senate resolution 239, providing for the continuance of the five additional pages employed during the last session and most of the last Congress. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to employ five additional pages for the Senate Chamber at $3 per day each during the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, to be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KING. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether the resolution proposes to increase the number of pages which heretofore have been employed?

Mr. CALDER. It does not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM MICHIGAN.

Mr. CALDER. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back favorably Senate resolution 11, submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], having reference to the Michigan election case. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas charges and countercharges of excessive and illegal expenditures of money and of unlawful practices have been made in connection with the election of a Senator from the State of Michigan, which election was held on the 5th day of November, 1918: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the said charges and countercharges of excessive and illegal expenditures of money and of unlawful practices in connection with the said election of a Senator from the State of Michigan, and to take possession of the ballots, poll books, tally sheets, and all other documents and records relating to the said election; and the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, and his deputies and assistants, be, and they are hereby, instructed to carry out the directions of the said Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, in that behalf; and that the said Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and it is hereby, directed to proceed with all convenient speed to take all necessary steps for the preservation of the said ballots, poll books, tally sheets, and other documents, and to recount the said ballots, and to take and preserve all evidence as to the various matters alleged in the said charges and countercharges, and of any alleged fraud, irregularity, and excessive and illegal expenditures of money, and of any unlawful practices in the said election and primary, and as to the intimidation of voters, or other facts affecting the result of said election.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate, or of the Congress, and to hold its sessions at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation; and to have full power to subpœna parties and witnesses, and to require the production of all papers, books, and documents, and other evidence relating to the said investigation; and to employ clerks and stenographers, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to take and make a record of all evidence taken and received by the committee; and to keep a record of its proceedings; and to have such evidence, records, and other matter required by the committee printed.

Resolved further, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and his deputies and assistants are hereby required to attend the said Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, and to execute its directions; that the chairman or any member of the committee be, and is hereby, empowered to administer oaths; that each of the parties to the said contest be entitled to representatives and attorneys at the recount and the taking of evidence; that all disputed ballots and records be preserved so that final action may be had thereon by the full committee and the Senate; that the committee may appoint subcommittees of one or more members to represent the committee at the various places in the making of the recount and the taking of evidence, and the committee may appoint such supervisors of the recount as it may deem best; and that the committee may adopt and enforce such rules and regulations for the conduct of the recount and the taking of evidence as it may deem wise, not inconsistent with this resolution; and that the committee shall report to the Senate as early as may be, and from time to time, if it deems best, submit all the testimony and the result of the recount and of the investigation.

Resolved further, That the expenses incurred in the carrying out of these resolutions shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers ordered by the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, and approved by the chairman of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I inquire whether the resolution has been considered by the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. POMERENE. Some time during the early part of last session this resolution was considered by the committee on Privileges and Elections and favorably reported, and it was then referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I knew, of course, that the general subject had been under consideration by the committee, but I was desirous of inquiring about this particular resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE subsequently said: Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], a few months ago the Senate had before it for consideration the resolution to investigate the Michigan senatorial election. It seems that the Committee on Privileges and Elections had proposed certain minor amendments to that resolution, and these amendments should have been printed in italics under the rules of the Senate. As a matter of fact they were printed in roman letters, so that these amendments were not called to the attention of the Secretary. The resolution as it was in fact adopted included all of the amendments which were proposed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but there is a parliamentary irregularity in that those amendments were not formally passed upon by the Senate, and it seems to me that under the circumstances these irregularities ought to be corrected. To that end I move to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to for the purpose of having these amendments adopted.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Were those amendments agreed to when the resolution was reported out from the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. POMERENE. They were agreed to in the committee, but I think not in the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I want to know—whether they were agreed to in the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. I think not.

Mr. LODGE. Then they certainly ought to be agreed to at some point.

Mr. POMERENE. I think so. I therefore move the reconsideration of the resolution.

Mr. CALDER. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Without objection, the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to will be reconsidered. The Secretary will state the amendments proposed by the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 6, after the word "Michigan" and the comma, insert "including the proceedings for the nomination of candidates at the primary theretofore held." On the same page, line 8, before the word "election," insert the words "primary nomination and." On page 2, line 10, after the word "countercharges" and before the comma, insert "and any answers hereafter filed." On the same page, line 11, strike out "and" and insert "or." On the same page, line 23, following the word "clerks," insert "and other necessary assistants."

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Whereas charges and countercharges of excessive and illegal expenditures of money and of unlawful practices have been made in connection with the primary nomination and election of a Senator from the State of Michigan, which election was held on the 5th day of November, 1918: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the said charges and countercharges of excessive and illegal expenditures of money and of unlawful practices in connection with the said election of a Senator from the State of Michigan, including the proceedings for the nomination of candidates at the primary theretofore held, and to take possession of the ballots, poll books, tally sheets, and all other documents and records relating to the said primary nomination and election; and the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, and his deputies and assistants, be, and they are hereby, instructed to carry out the directions of the said Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, in that behalf; and that the said Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and it is hereby, directed to proceed with all convenient speed to take all necessary steps for the preservation of the said ballots, poll books, tally sheets, and other documents, and to recount the said ballots, and to take and preserve all evidence as to the various matters alleged in the said charges and countercharges and any answers hereafter filed, and of any alleged fraud, irregularity, and excessive or illegal expenditures of money, and of any unlawful practices in the said election and primary, and as to the intimidation of voters, or other facts affecting the result of said election.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate and during any recess of the Senate, or of the Congress, and to hold its sessions at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of the investigation; and to have full power to subpœna parties and witnesses, and to require the production of all papers, books, and documents, and other evidence relating to the said investigation; and to employ clerks and other necessary assistants, and stenographers, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to take and make a record of all evidence taken and received by the committee; and to keep a record of its proceedings; and to have such evidence, records, and other matter required by the committee printed.

Resolved further, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and his deputies and assistants are hereby required to attend the said Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, and to execute its directions; that the chairman or any member of the committee be, and is hereby, empowered to administer oaths; that each of the parties to the said contest be entitled to representatives and attorneys at the recount and the taking of evidence; that all disputed ballots and records be preserved so that final action may be had thereon by the full committee and the Senate; that the committee may appoint subcommittees of one or more members to represent the committee at the various places in the making of the recount and the taking of evidence, and the committee may appoint such supervisors of the recount as it may deem best; and that the committee may adopt and enforce such rules and regulations for the conduct of the recount and the taking of evidence as it may deem wise, not inconsistent with this resolution; and that the committee shall report to the Senate as early as may be, and from time to time, if it deems best, submit all the testimony and the result of the recount and of the investigation.

Resolved further, That the expenses incurred in the carrying out of these resolutions shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers ordered by the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, and approved by the chairman of the committee.

The preamble was amended so as to read:

Whereas charges and countercharges of excessive and illegal expenditures of money and of unlawful practices have been made in connection with the primary nomination and election of a Senator from the State of Michigan, which election was held on the 5th day of November, 1918: Therefore be it.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Mr. CALDER. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back favorably Senate resolution 217, submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 217) submitted by Mr. WATSON on October 20, 1919, was read as follows:

Whereas there is reason to believe that a number of the employees of the Federal Trade Commission have been and now are engaged in socialistic propaganda and in furthering the organization and growth of socialistic organizations; and

Whereas if Bolshevism, with all that it implies, is to be met and overcome in our country it must be done by first ousting all its adherents and advocates from public office: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to inquire into and report to the Senate at the earliest practical date upon the truthfulness of these charges; that said committee may conduct such inquiry by subcommittee or otherwise; and shall be empowered to hold sessions during the recess of the Senate; and for this purpose the committee or any subcommittee thereof is empowered to send for persons and papers, to employ whatever assistance, either clerical or legal, they deem necessary to aid in conducting the investigation, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, to conduct hearings and have reports of the same printed for use; and any expense in connection with such inquiry shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from New York has asked for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CALDER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not rise to object to its immediate consideration, but I do want to offer an amendment to the resolution, if it is to be considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CUMMINS. I offer an amendment to the resolution, to be inserted at the proper place, immediately before the concluding paragraph.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the resolution by adding the following:

The committee is further directed to inquire generally into the work of the commission, the procedure it has adopted, the authority it has exercised, its attitude toward the business of the country, and make report respecting the value of the commission as a governmental agency.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, just a word with regard to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, my attention was diverted and I did not hear the reading of the original resolution. May we have it read again?

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the resolution.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I know nothing about the allegations that are suggested in the resolution. I express no opinion whatever upon the truth of these suggestions; but I believe that there has been for some time past an organized movement to discredit the Federal Trade Commission, and if it has merited the displeasure and the criticisms of the business public generally it ought to be known.

My amendment is simply to broaden the scope of the resolution so that the committee may inquire into all of the activities of the commission and advise the Senate with regard to the value of the commission as a governmental agency or function. I do not think the work we would do in that regard would be without value to the community generally.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, about 15 years ago President Roosevelt recommended to Congress the passage of the meat-inspection bill; and I want to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a short statement by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who was President Roosevelt's spokesman on the floor of this Chamber at that time. It was in reply to statements we are hearing now about socialists and anarchists from the packers in their propaganda and I shall take the time of the Senate to read it.

The Senator from Massachusetts said, on June 30, 1906—I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> What has been the history of that group of men who run those packing establishments? It has been a history of utter defiance of law and of public opinion.

In the same speech the Senator from Massachusetts said:

> But I say, Mr. President, and I say it in all seriousness, that those packers in Chicago * * * have done more to advance socialism and anarchism and unrest and agitation than all the socialistic agitators who stand to-day between the oceans.

At that time, when Commissioner Garfield, of the Bureau of Corporations—now the Federal Trade Commission—investigated the packers, their books showed that they had $92,148,000, I believe. Now they have $479,055,000. During the 15 years $87,930,000 new capital has been added and they have paid in dividends $105,938,000. At that time they claimed, just as they are claiming now, that their profits were such that they could hardly live; and what the Senator from Massachusetts said 15 years ago is doubly true at this time.

When the resolution was first introduced I stated that if the Federal Trade Commission was discredited and the consuming public had no protection from the high cost of living caused by the packers' monopoly it would do a thousand times more to encourage socialism and anarchism than a few employees of the commission.

The packers' tremendous organization could be of great assistance to cattle and hog raisers and in reducing the high cost of living, and it would be a great mistake to pass legislation that would destroy them, but their record the past 15 or more years shows they are trying to gouge the public, make exorbitant profits, increase the high cost of living, destroy competition, and it is absolutely necessary to pass legislation to curb them and protect the consuming public and the cattle and hog raisers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I know no reason why the Senate should go upon record as declaring that "there is reason to believe that a number of the employees of the Federal Trade Commission have been and now are engaged in socialistic propaganda and in furthering the organization and growth of socialistic organizations." That may be true. Whether it is true or not I have no information on the subject. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] addressed the Senate on this subject some time ago and submitted some considerations which evidently impelled him to that belief; but, speaking for myself, I do not desire to pass any judgment upon this matter upon an ex parte showing.

Inasmuch as the resolution is not in any wise affected by the recitals of the preamble, I move that the preamble be stricken from the resolution. I apprehend that probably there will be no objection on the part of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I care nothing about the preamble. All I want is the investigation. Of course the preamble is not essential to the strength or the validity of the resolution. I based the preamble on my own remarks concerning the situation, and I had such information as led me to believe, of course, that what I had to say about specific individuals connected with and employed by the Federal Trade Commission was true, and, of course, I based my resolution on the preamble, and my preamble on what I thought was my own knowledge of the situation. Of course, I do not care to bind the Senator from Montana, but my understanding is that the preamble does not bind anybody who votes for a resolution of this character. It is only the basis upon which the resolution rests, and is not in any way binding upon the conscience of any Member of the Senate as declaratory of the alleged facts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why not, then, consent to strike out the preamble and pass the resolution?

Mr. WATSON. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That disposes of that, Mr. President.

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator will pardon me, while I am on my feet I desire to say that so far as I have the right to do so I am entirely willing to accept the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, which he and I have previously discussed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Indiana that if the preamble is stricken out I imagine it will be necessary to make some brief changes in the body of the resolution. I suggest that he make inquiry about that.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator pardon me? I did not hear him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the preamble goes out, there is nothing left of the resolution.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the text of the resolution, on lines 4 and 5 it refers to "the truthfulness of these charges," which are evidently the charges referred to in the preamble. It is necessary to make some modification.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It simply charges that employees are "engaged in socialistic propaganda and in furthering the organization and growth of socialistic organizations."

Mr. WATSON. That is precisely the thing I want to inquire into.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I suggest to the Senator that perhaps he had better incorporate that in the body of the resolution.

In view of what I have said about this matter, I desire to add that so far as I am concerned I can see no reason why the Senate of the United States should take notice of the employment by the Federal Trade Commission of a man who professes the doctrines of socialism. If he is otherwise competent and able to discharge the duties of the office, what is the difference what his political opinions are so far as socialism is concerned? Suppose, Mr. President, we should discover, as a result of this investigation, that there are, indeed, a number of employees of the Federal Trade Commission who profess the theory of socialism, and who on occasions preach the doctrines of socialism, what should we do about it?

Mr. BORAH. I suppose, under the practice we are adopting now, we should deport them. The method seems to be now, if we disagree with anybody, to suppress, imprison, or deport them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I leave that statement with the Senator from Idaho. I had not observed that we were deporting any socialists merely because they were socialists, but perhaps the Senator from Idaho has more definite information on that subject. The point I was making, Mr. President, is that so far as I have yet been able to discover it is not a crime to be a socialist. I am not one.

I do not indorse that theory of economics or that theory of politics. But I am at a loss to understand how in this country, where free speech is guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, we can deny to a man the right to embrace or to teach the doctrines of socialism, nor can I understand how you can deny him an opportunity to seek employment in the public service because he is a socialist.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator place any limitation on the right of free speech in the United States?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I discussed that matter at some considerable length, as the Senator may recall, in an effort to secure legislation which would punish and suppress the preaching of the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force. That is the distinction I made between the right of free speech and the abuse of free speech.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I am advised, from various publications which I have, that there is one wing of the Socialist Party of the United States which has accepted in all of its implications the most extreme Bolshevik doctrines and is advocating the overthrow of the United States Government by force. They class themselves as socialists of the left wing. Does the Senator think that it would be proper for the Government of the United States to install voluntarily in positions of trust and responsibility men who are advocating the overthrow of the United States Government by force and violence?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. By no means.

Mr. KING. They are socialists, or they allege that they are socialists.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They may be; but there are many other socialists who do not advocate that doctrine. If the resolution were an inquiry into the employment of men who, claiming to be socialists or anything else, preach the doctrine of the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence, I should, of course, have no word of criticism of the resolution, but I call your attention to the fact that that is not the resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if there is any line of demarcation as to what constitutes preaching the overthrow of the Government by violence and what does not? Some of the tracts and documents which are now accepted among men as teaching proper constitutional theories were once condemned under the very rule which the Senator now states. Take, for instance, Tom Paine's Rights of Man. He was prosecuted for that, and upon the theory that he proposed to destroy the English Government by force and violence.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, if he did, he was properly punished.

Mr. BORAH. At that time they thought he was preaching that doctrine. At this time his doctrine is quite orthodox.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I see no difficulty in the situation at all. The preaching of crime, the incital to the commission of crime, ought always to be made a crime. It is a crime to overthrow the Government of the United States or any other government by violence.

Mr. BORAH. If you get down to the concrete proposition of defining a certain act as a crime and punishing it as such, you have some standard by which to go; but bills now on the calendar of the Senate do not establish that rule at all, in my judgment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, we can canvass that when we come to it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not understand that the Government is, or that it has been, engaged in the attempt to deport individuals now in the United States because they have expressed sentiments which challenge those of the majority. I think that my friend, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], was merely facetious when he suggested that proposition. Unless I am very badly misinformed, all the proceedings having in view the deportation of people from the United States are based upon the provisions of section 19 of the immigration act of 1917, which affect aliens, and aliens only.

It is very difficult to draw a well-defined line of division between what is and what is not preaching treason against the Government and the use of violent means for its overthrow, but it is not at all difficult in individual cases to so determine. Thomas Paine never preached or advocated bloodshed, violence, disorder, the destruction of property, and universal chaos.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that Tom Paine did not, but, nevertheless, that was the theory upon which they proceeded against Mr. Paine.

Mr. THOMAS. I was about to say that he lived in an age when anyone who questioned the divine origin of Christianity proclaimed himself to be an enemy of mankind, because it was assumed, and perhaps rightly, that the religious sentiment was the cement of society, and that opposition to its acceptance would lead to its dissolution.

Mr. BORAH. I am not referring now to Paine's Age of Reason. I am referring to his book on the Rights of Man.

Mr. THOMAS. I think I know what the Senator is referring to.

Mr. BORAH. That did not deal with the subject of Christianity at all.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true; but Mr. Paine's unpopularity was the outgrowth of his Age of Reason.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. Paine, if I remember correctly, had not written his Age of Reason at that time.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is probably correct. Paine's contributions to the literature of the American Revolution were one of the strongest supports of that cause, and while his doctrines were aimed at the overthrow of monarchy, and therefore unusual, they were received with plaudits and a spirit of gratitude that was in strong contrast with the treatment which he subsequently received at the hands of those whom he had so greatly benefited.

His contributions to the literature of the French Revolution, and written at a time when that revolution was rampant, were associated with a condition which at that time prevailed, and which he was supporting. Revolution was rife against the French Government, and British sentiment naturally inflamed and took alarm at his doctrines and condemned them. But his political tracts are not to be compared, in my judgment, with those which are justly considered to-day as an abuse of the right of free speech and of the right of agitation against the Government. While the construction placed upon them in that period of excitement may have been identical, the construction here placed upon the so-called "red" literature of to-day must largely be that contemplated by the immigration act. I do not understand that a citizen of the United States engaged in the dissemination of these destructive doctrines is subject to deportation. If he is, I hope the Senator will enlighten me.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know exactly where they draw the line. I want to say frankly, although it may be a little shocking, that I am entirely opposed to the principle of deportation for any reason. If we admit aliens into this country, it is our business to take care of them and to deal with them ourselves from that time on. That is one part of the white man's burden which it seems to me we should assume. I look upon deportation as ineffective and more or less shirking responsibility. If we once admit people to this country, we should take upon ourselves the burden of teaching them the worth of our institutions and of making them good citizens. If they are incorrigible criminals, then we have penitentiaries, insane asylums, and electric chairs of our own. I have never been able to accept the theory that it is just the brave and manly thing to do to ship those whom we have once admitted to our shores off to other peoples.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator doubtless has the best of reasons for his opinion, as he always has. But I contend, Mr. President, that when the immigration act, deliberately passed by the Congress of the United States over the veto of the President, designed to meet new conditions, among which are those we are now discussing, provides for deportation, when its terms are violated it is the duty of the immigration authorities to see to its rigid enforcement. A man comes here as an alien, under the provisions of the law permitting him to do so. So long as he is an alien he must observe the conditions under which he is permitted to remain in the United States.

Mr. BORAH. I am not criticizing any particular officer.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not only not criticizing them; I commend them for carrying out and effectuating the provisions of the law to which I refer. Whether the Senator voted for that bill when it was enacted I do not know. I voted for it, and I voted to sustain it over the President's veto. I assert that public safety, in my judgment, requires that if an alien who is permitted to come to the United States abuses his asylum by preaching the doctrines of anarchy, violence, and the overthrow of the Government in deliberate violation of our laws, he ought to be deported, and he ought to be deported as incontinently as possible.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that doctrine is not confined to aliens.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. BORAH. I know that I am not mistaken. I know some of the most pronounced advocates of I. W. W.ism in this country were born in America, their parents were born in America, and their families have been in America for generations. The most pronounced leaders of that cause are of that class.

Mr. THOMAS. Have any of them been deported?

Mr. BORAH. No; none of them have been deported that I know of.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, my contention is correct, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. Where would you take them?

Mr. THOMAS. We can not deport a citizen of the United States, whatever his offense; and I do not think that any attempt has been made to do so.

I quite agree that many of the members of the I. W. W. organization are native-born Americans, men who ought to know better. Men who are engaged in the carrying on of this propaganda find its most fertile soil in the minds of the very men we are discussing.

Coming to this resolution, I agree with the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I do not think that because a man is a socialist he should be condemned, even in the abstract. I am acquainted with a great many socialists, high-minded men and women, conscientious men and women, who believe as firmly and sincerely in their doctrines of socialism as I believe in the ancient doctrines of the Democratic Party.

Mr. BORAH. Ancient?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

The socialists to whom I refer are just as law-abiding citizens as I profess to be. They have no intention of proceeding against the institutions of the American Government except as the provisions of the law permit. They represent a constitutional movement. Their purpose is to introduce socialism through the machinery that has been provided for changes in the Government, and to which they have a perfect right to resort.

Some of the socialists of the United States are among our most patriotic citizens, and many of our laws, our most popular laws, are merely the expression of socialistic conditions, of which the protective tariff is one. But if there be in any department—and my real criticism of the resolution of the Senator from Indiana is that it is confined to but one bureau—individuals who, calling themselves socialists, utilize their positions for the dissemination of what we call Bolshevist propaganda or are using their appellation as socialists as a cloak for unlawful conduct, the Government ought at least be informed of it. All this resolution does, as I understand, is to ascertain the facts and lay them before the Senate.

I want to assure the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that I will stand with him at all times and under all circumstances for the right of any individual to be employed in the Government service, I do not care what his beliefs are, political or religious, so long as he is competent, does his duty, and obeys the law.

Mr. BORAH. I quite agree with the Senator from Colorado that it does not make any difference whether a man is a socialist or whether he is a Democrat or Republican, so far as his employment is concerned, if he performs the services which devolve upon him as an employee of the Government. I am not at all disagreeing with the Senator upon that proposition. I do not know of any advantage which would be derived by this information if we had it.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, that is another consideration. It may be entirely useless. We have reached the point where we are prone to investigate everything that is brought to our attention, and this investigation, like scores of those which have preceded it, may merely result in the expenditure of money.

Mr. BORAH. If we keep on at the rate we are going, in the next 25 years the Government will be run by socialists.

Mr. THOMAS. It will be run by investigations. There is a tendency to socialism in the Democratic Party. There is a tendency to socialism in the Republican Party. There is a tendency to socialism in both parties, because both parties want the socialist vote. We become more and more lenient about all forms of propaganda as we prefer our seats to the performance of our duties.

Mr. CUMMINS. In just what sense does the Senator from Colorado use the word "socialist"?

Mr. THOMAS. I use the word "socialism," or I did use it when interrupted, to designate that class of individuals who profess what they call socialism as a political faith and which they use as the basis of a political organization. I presume it is that sort of socialism to which my distinguished friend the Senator from Idaho referred in his discussion.

But I shall not detain the Senate so long as to defeat the object of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who I suppose wants action upon his resolution. I shall vote for it because, among other things, of the attack that has been made upon the Senator from Indiana by the commission, who merely assumed to exercise his unquestioned right as a Senator of the United States to present it.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Idaho referred to the fact that there are a number of people in this country who were native born, whose parents lived here, who are American citizens, and who have adopted the doctrines of the I. W. W. He put the question to the Senator from Colorado as to whether or not those could be deported, and I understood the Senator from Colorado to say they could not; that they were American citizens.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I could not have said anything else.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not quite understand that. I must differ a little with it. If an American citizen is convicted of what is declared to be a crime by Congress under proper legislation, why can not that American citizen be imprisoned on the island of Guam or somewhere else, and deported in that way and detained in that way as well as an alien, notwithstanding he may be an American citizen?

Mr. THOMAS. That is not deportation as we understand the term. That would be the imposition of a sentence as the result of conviction, and the sentence would be executed in accordance with its terms. Guam is a part of the United States of America. You can not make a Botany Bay out of it. Congress may, if it sees fit, of course, provide exile to that place for the punishment of those who have been convicted of violation of the criminal laws, but no such procedure is necessary, nor indeed is it possible to resort to it for the enforcement of the immigration laws concerning alien deportation.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the Senator's position then to be that these people could not be deported to other countries?

Mr. THOMAS. An American citizen must first be indicted by proper procedure; he must then be tried by a jury of his peers, and convicted——

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. THOMAS. Then he must suffer whatever sentence may be lawfully imposed upon him as a result of that conviction.

Mr. FLETCHER. As a result of that he can be deported——

Mr. THOMAS. No; he can not.

Mr. FLETCHER. From the United States proper to some such place, as I have suggested.

Mr. THOMAS. No; he can not, because there is no law that I know of which would enable the Government to do that.

Mr. FLETCHER. We might pass a law.

Mr. THOMAS. That is a different proposition. What we may do in the future is one thing. What the status of such an individual is now is another.

Mr. FLETCHER. I quite agree with the Senator's remarks regarding the immigration law. I am not making any issue on that.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the matter intended to be investigated by the resolution is set forth in the preamble. The preamble is divided into two paragraphs. The first paragraph refers to those reputed to be in the employ of the Federal Trade Commission who are engaged in socialistic propaganda, and evidently refers to Socialists. The second paragraph, however, refers to Bolshevism, and says:

> Whereas if Bolshevism, with all that it implies, is to be met and overcome in our country it must be done by first ousting all its adherents and advocates from public office.

I believe, taking these two paragraphs together and construing them in pari materia, the sense of them is that the resolution is aimed at socialists who may be in the employ of the Federal Trade Commission, if there be any, who hold, teach, or preach those extreme radical views of socialism which are synonymous with Bolshevism. I believe that is a reasonable construction of the preamble.

Whatever may be our views about the advisability of having socialists in the employ of the Federal Government, I do not believe the Senate would want to go on record as opposing a resolution to investigate the employment, in any branch of the Federal Government, of socialists who hold the extreme socialistic views which are synonymous with Bolshevism and who teach or preach them, as Bolshevism is understood in this country.

I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the fact that if the preamble is stricken out he will have to redraft his resolution so as to give something to investigate. I further call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that if he would strike out of the first line of the first paragraph of the preamble the words "there is reason to believe" and insert in lieu thereof the words "it is charged" the preamble would then read, "Whereas it is charged that a number of the employees," and so forth; and that is true, because a few weeks ago the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] made upon the floor of the Senate the charge that is embodied in the preamble.

I merely wish to call attention to the fact that the preamble of the resolution should be amended in some such way, if there is to be anything to investigate, and, when amended in that way, I do not believe the Senate will object to the resolution. If there be people in the employ of the Federal Trade Commission who are of those extreme socialists whose views are synonymous with Bolshevism, and who believe, teach, or preach Bolshevism in this country while employed in a department of the Federal Government, I think it should be known, so Congress may take such action as it may see fit.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it is rather difficult to define socialism. There are nearly as many forms of socialism as there are views as to what is evolution or what causes contribute to biological development. There are persons denominated as socialists whose views are very enlightening and whose devotion to good government and the cause of liberty and civilization no one can question. Some of the most brilliant writers and thinkers of the age class themselves as socialists. Some of the ablest of our university teachers and writers would probably be called socialists. I agree with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that no person should be excluded from the Government service because he may entertain the views expressed by some branches of socialism. In my opinion, there have been great contributions to the cause of humanity brought about by socialists. Hard political creeds have been modified by the views of those who claim to be socialists, and industrial and political policies, fraught with injustice, have been changed and softened owing to the zealous efforts of some so-called socialists. There are thousands who are denominated socialists who believe that changes should be made in some branches of our Government and that the power of the State governments and the Federal Government should be increased, and many of the industries and activities now carried on by individuals should pass under the control and ownership of the governments of either the States or the National Government, but they do not advocate revolution or violence or the overthrow of our Government by force. They claim that their views, if carried into legislation, would effectuate needed reforms, and they seek to bring about such reforms by fair and earnest propaganda. Men of this class, while we may not always agree with them, are not to be denounced or condemned. They have a right to participate in the Government and to hold positions of trust and responsibility. There must not be any discrimination against them. But it is known that there are revolutionary socialists, those who support revolution in this and in other lands. They are not content to advocate their views and seek to convert the people to their industrial and political policies. They propose violence, bloodshed, revolution.

Men who belong to the revolutionary group of socialists and who are seeking by force and violence to destroy this Republic should not be employed in any department of governmental service. Their activities and propaganda constitute a form of treason against the Republic; and I can see but little difference in principle between a military force which lands upon our shore with the avowed purpose of overthrowing the Government and subjecting the American people to a foreign rule, and the efforts of organizations within our midst, the members of which are in large part aliens, to destroy the entire industrial, economic, and political system under which we live, and to set up a tyrannous and oppressive class government which would rule as the Bolshevists have ruled in Russia. There are those in our midst who entertain the same views as the Spartacides and Bolshevists and who seek the overthrow of this Republic.

I desire to briefly call the attention of the Senate to a manifesto recently issued by one branch of the Socialist Party. I think it is called "the left wing" of the Socialist Party. In a convention held in February of this year this socialist group adopted rules of organization and issued a manifesto, which it distributed throughout the country. It authorized publication of a paper known as the Revolutionary Age, and indorsed it as the official organ of the group. John Reed, who at one time was in Russia and supported while there Lenin and Trotski, was selected as the New York editor of this paper. I understand that Mr. Reed is now in Russia or en route to Russia, where doubtless he will confer with the Bolshevik leaders and return to the United States, either with an abundance of money to carry on Bolshevist propaganda in the United States or, as the representative of the Bolsheviki, will be authorized to seek the establishment of a dictatorship of the proletariat in this Republic. This branch of the socialist organization, in its April issue, 1919, of the Revolutionary Age, states the following:

> There has been no revolutionary group in America who possessed the whole of the theory and practice of the Bolshevik-Spartacan revolution. And most of these groups still cling to their old concepts. There is now only one revolutionary group in complete accord, in its manifesto and program, with Bolshevism, and that is the left wing of the American Socialist Party. And our task is the unity and concentration of the revolutionary forces of the American proletariat on a Bolshevik-Spartacan basis.

Let me read one or two of the planks in their platform:

> We stand for a uniform declaration of principles in all party platforms, both local and national, and the abolition of all social reform planks now contained in them.
> The party must teach—

That is, the Socialist Party—> propagate, and agitate exclusively for the overthrow of capitalism, and the establishment of socialism through a proletarian dictatorship.

> The Socialist candidates elected to office shall adhere strictly to the above provisions.
> We believe it is the mission of the socialist movement to encourage and assist the proletariat to adopt newer and more effective forms of organization and to stir it into newer and more revolutionary modes of action.
> We demand that the official party press be party owned and controlled—

That is, the Socialist Party, this party which is revolutionary in character, this party which seeks the dictatorship of the proletariat, declares that the press shall be owned and controlled by it—

> We demand that the Socialist Party—

I am omitting a large number of these planks—> shall elect delegates to the international congress proposed by the Communist Party of Russia [Bolsheviki]—

They put in brackets "Bolsheviki"; they call the Bolsheviki Party the Communist Party of Russia. They demand that this socialist organization which is seeking control of the socialists of the United States elect representatives to the Bolshevik international congress—> that our party shall participate only in a new international with which are affiliated the Communist Party of Russia [Bolsheviki], the Communist Labor Party of Germany [Spartacans], and all other left-wing parties and groups.

Mr. President, if there are individuals who belong to this group within the Government service, they should be promptly dismissed, and if there are those who now fill positions of responsibility in the Government service who openly or secretly advocate the violation of law or a violent change in our form of government or the principles for which the Bolsheviki stand, or who seek to undermine the faith of the people in this Republic, they should be immediately removed from office. As I understand, it is to individuals who come within this class that the resolution of the Senator from Indiana refers. In supporting the resolution I am assuming that there is no purpose to remove from the service of the Government persons who belong to the class of Socialists to whom I first referred. I am heartily in favor, however, of the discharge from the service of the Government of any persons who entertain views that lie at the base of Bolshevism or the left-wing revolutionary group of Socialists now active in the United States.

There is just one further word that I wish to submit, and that relates to the statement just made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. He spoke in commendatory terms of the work of the officials of the Department of Labor in deporting aliens who come within the terms of existing law relating to deportation. I regret that I can not approve of the views expressed by the Senator. The number of aliens deported during the past two years has been wholly unimportant. Hundreds, if not thousands, should have been deported if the Department of Labor had energetically and faithfully performed its duty and lived up to the provisions of the law. I am of opinion that some of the officials in the Labor Department who were charged with the duty of deporting aliens have been derelict. I feel that there have been those who did not sympathize with the laws requiring the deportation of certain aliens, and they have failed to act and to drive from our shores many whose activities were pernicious and who have contributed to industrial anarchy and who have sought the overthrow of this Republic. In this criticism I do not include Mr. Caminetti, the Commissioner of Immigration. It is my opinion that he has earnestly attempted the discharge of the duties resting upon him, but I believe there have been influences at work in the department, and perhaps outside of the department, which have circumvented his purpose and interposed obstacles to the accomplishment of his desires. It is to be hoped that a change will be made and that the laws relating to the deportation of aliens will be vigorously enforced.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I want to ask a question of the Senator from Utah. Is there any bill pending having for its object the prevention of the circulation of propaganda like that contained in the paper from which the Senator has made quotations?

Mr. KING. There are a number of bills pending before the Judiciary Committee which make it an offense to circulate seditious literature, and I think the bill which will be called up for consideration within a few moments by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] relates to seditious literature and to its circulation and dissemination through the mails of the Government.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does that bill have for its object the prevention also of utterances such as those to which the Senator from Utah has referred?

Mr. KING. There are a number of bills now pending before the Judiciary Committee dealing with this subject, but the committee has been so far unable to agree as to them.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the Senator from Utah think that we are likely to have legislation along these lines?

Mr. KING. I think that the Judiciary Committee will report a bill in a short time that will prevent the dissemination, through the mails, at least, and the publication of literature aimed at the destruction of the Government by force and violence. Indeed, I think the bill now on the calendar will reach some of the matters the Senator has in mind.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Or the utterance of such revolutionary doctrines?

Mr. KING. Or the advocacy of such revolutionary doctrines?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator from Utah will pardon me, I desire to say to the Senator from Texas that my understanding of the bill of which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has charge is that it is addressed to oral utterances as well as to written declarations.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I might call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that to-day literature of this kind is going in dress-suit cases, carried on trains, into his own State, and literature of a much more alarming character is being transmitted through the same source.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I hope that we will have legislation of such character as will terminate that practice.

Mr. FALL. I hope we will have some action which will at least tend to prevent it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I desire to submit a resolution, but I fancy I am not in order at this time during a discussion of the pending measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That would not be in order at this time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate I withdraw the motion submitted by me to strike out the preamble, and I adopt the suggestion of my colleague to substitute for the words "there is reason to believe," in the first line of the first paragraph of the preamble, the words "it is charged"; and to strike out the second paragraph of the preamble, which reads:

Whereas if Bolshevism, with all it implies, is to be met and overcome in our country it must be done by first ousting all its adherents and advocates from public office.

I do that because it is not recited in the first part of the preamble that there are any Bolshevists in the employ of the Federal Trade Commission, but only socialists and those advocating socialistic propaganda.

I understand that the Senator from Indiana contends that the two words signify the same thing, or at least they shade into each other by imperceptible gradations. However that may be, we can not overlook the fact that the strongest political party in the Republic of France is the Socialist Party, and that the Socialist Party is probably the dominant party in every country in Europe. It would be utterly wrong in the Senate of the United States to denounce all those people, who are undoubtedly desirous of accomplishing their ends by constitutional means in accordance with the institutions of their respective countries, as being supporters of the doctrine of Bolshevism. The effect of the resolution will not be in any way influenced by eliminating the second paragraph, and if that is accepted I shall not press further the motion.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am glad my colleague has seen fit to adopt my suggestion in regard to striking out several words in the first line of the first paragraph of the preamble and inserting other words; but I would be sorry to see the reference to Bolshevism stricken out, because if there is to be any investigation it seems to me Bolshevism ought to be investigated even more than socialism.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then I suggest to the Senator that he ought to amend the first paragraph by so declaring. That would be entirely satisfactory to me. If the first paragraph is amended to read that employees have been and now are engaged in Bolshevik propaganda and in furthering the organization of Bolshevik associations, I should have no objection to it at all; but that is not the resolution.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, it is not my resolution, and I leave that to the author of the resolution, of course.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think it goes without saying that no Government which holds its own life sacred ought to employ those whose avowed or concealed aim it is to destroy that Government. In that far I am in sympathy with what has been proposed, with the modifications which have been suggested by the Senator from Montana; but, outside of that, I wish to utter a word of warning. What I have said applies to the employees of the Government itself. The Government's first duty is self-preservation. But I wish to impress upon the Senate the fact that always and everywhere repression has been the mother of revolution, and that those who want to fight the Government are very much less strong when they are forced into the open than they are when confined to private and secret machinations.

If I had my way I would make every fool in the United States who advances a fool doctrine utter them "out loud," so that the people who have common sense may hear and combat them. I share with Mr. Jefferson the idea that error has no dangers so long as reason is left free to combat it. If I did not share that opinion, then I would lose my confidence in democracy, because I would lose my confidence in "the common sense of most," which, as Tennyson says, is held to be the hope upon which we may rely to "hold fretful realms in awe." Of course, if a man has no confidence in the common sense of most, has no confidence in humanity and his fellow men's reasoning capacity, their common sense and their common conscience, then his first idea is to repress every error, but we have learned—and learned long ago, I hope—that the best way to combat error is to let it show its head and then hit to combat it.

Why, Mr. President, not only political errors but religious errors of every sort exist. There never yet was a faith so infernally absurd that it could not find a martyr, whether that faith were religious or political. But it is the part of wisdom to leave it as free as possible, partially because it has a right to be free, and still more because that is the best way of overcoming it.

The revolutions that have occurred in Russia grew out of repression. Had there been the opportunity for the last hundred years for Russians to discuss matters in public and for fools to make fool utterances where they could be heard and answered by wise men, or at least by men having more sense than they, whether wise or not, the Russian revolution never would have taken place. The same thing is absolutely true of the extremes of the French Revolution. It is true to a certain though to a less extent than in Russia of the Spartacan movement in Germany. The best way to strengthen a lot of conspirators who are at the same time more or less asses, absolutely ignorant of the economic laws of the world, is to force them to private meetings of every malign and murderous description, and to keep their propaganda amongst themselves, instead of giving an opportunity for men who do know something—although most men do not know much, ourselves included—about the laws of nature and economics to combat and defeat their doctrines.

So I wanted to utter a word of warning here, that we might not make the mistake that nearly everybody makes at times when the pendulum of the clock has gone too far in one direction, and that mistake is to make the pendulum of the clock not only go as far as natural reaction would carry it, but by artificial acceleration go still farther in the opposite direction. After all is said and done, the best thing, not for the utterer, not for the publisher alone of false and dangerous misborn doctrines, but for the world, is to let opinion be free for utterance, and let counteraction be equally free for utterance.

Of course, when the opinion takes the shape of absolute license and the encouragement of violence against the Government itself instead of resorting to the ballot box, a different principle comes into operation, and that is the principle of curbing violence, and not only curbing violence but curbing incitation to violence. That ought to be the only limit to the freedom of utterance, to wit, to curb violence itself and active incitation to violence. You do that on behalf of the public peace, not because you are afraid of the error, not because you distrust humanity's common sense and common conscience, not because you are afraid that that sort of thing will gain a sufficient number of adherents to govern your country, but because it leads immediately to disturbance of the peace, and it is the duty of every government to stop that. Further than that government ought not, in peace times at any rate, to go. In war times it is sometimes important to treat certain elements as if they were "friends of the enemy," or as if they were spies, as they very frequently virtually are.

While we are counteracting things that are wrong, we must not ourselves go too far in the opposite direction, and ourselves perpetrate wrong. In that case while suppressing new things we might in the mêlée ineffectually fight against and postpone some true things.

This immediate proposition, however, involves a different principle. The Government itself ought not to support and pay men and employ men who want to destroy the Government. That is a different proposition. Leaving a man free to say what he pleases, no matter how foolish or false it is, is one thing; but furnishing him an easy berth and a salary whereby he may be encouraged to continue it, and furnishing that berth in the Government service and at the expense of the people, is totally another thing. That last-mentioned thing ought to be stopped if it exists, which I doubt, and until and unless proof is made, deny.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I do not care to make a speech on this subject, because everybody is familiar with the resolution and what is intended to be accomplished by it. What I want is action and not speech. Speech is easy but action seems to be somewhat difficult.

I have talked with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and I think he is in agreement with me that if we modify the first section of the preamble so as to read:

Whereas it is charged that a number of the employees of the Federal Trade Commission have been and now are engaged in socialistic and bolshevistic propaganda—and then permit the second section of the preamble to remain as it is, that will be satisfactory to him.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I suggest to the Senator that the word "bolshevistic" ought to come in the last line of the first paragraph also.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; "and in furthering the organization and growth of socialistic and bolshevistic organizations." With that I am in entire sympathy, and have no objection to that modification.

The first question, I think, is on the amendment that I offered. Then the second amendment is the one suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and if that be agreeable I can assure the Senate I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). The Chair declared the amendment of the Senator from Iowa agreed to. The question should be on the resolution, and then, after that, the preamble should be disposed of. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, as I understand, the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has not been passed upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been agreed to. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana offers certain amendments to the preamble, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 1, strike out the words "there is reason to believe" and insert "it is charged," so that the preamble will read:

Whereas it is charged that a number of the employees of the Federal Trade Commission—

And so forth.

Also, in the last line of the first paragraph of the preamble, after the word "socialistic," insert the word "bolshevistic," so that it will read:

The organization and growth of socialistic and bolshevistic organizations.

Mr. WATSON. And in the first part, I suggest to the Chair, it should read:

That a number of the employees of the Federal Trade Commission have been and now are engaged in socialistic and bolshevistic propaganda, and in furthering the organization and growth of socialistic and bolshevistic organizations.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the same words on line 3, following the word "socialistic."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments to the preamble.

The amendments were agreed to.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

CONDITIONS ON MEXICAN BORDER.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I offer a concurrent resolution and ask that it may be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 20) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the military forces of the United States in protecting the lives of American citizens in the United States, but whose safety, nevertheless, is imperiled by the threats and obviously hostile attitude toward citizens of the United States on the part of the armed Mexican bandits, murderous outlaws, and the various belligerent factions now assembling in Mexico adjacent to the international boundary line separating the United States and the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I assume that the concurrent resolution should go to the Committee on Military Affairs, but I earnestly hope that to whatever committee this concurrent resolution may be sent that such committee will report the same favorably. I am prepared to lay before that committee information showing the necessity for the immediate passage of the concurrent resolution. During the past two months I have been constantly in receipt of letters and telegrams from Arizona detailing a situation on the Mexican border which I do not feel at liberty, nor do I feel that it would serve any useful purpose, to include in the RECORD just now, but which I am willing to lay before the Senate in executive session or to a committee of the Senate at the appropriate time. Were I to make the information public I fear the safety of a large number of our citizens would further be jeopardized, as the situation now is perilous.

When my colleague and I entered the Senate on the 2d day of April, 1912, I think, if not the first, certainly one of the first official acts on our part was to call at the War Department and urge that a sufficient number of troops be kept on the Mexican border to protect American citizens in the United States who were peaceably residing within the United States, and we have never ceased our activity in that regard. It has been, however, a discouraging task. It seems beyond the domain of possibility to impress the War Department with the fact that American citizens in the United States have been and are now in peril from the aggressions and raids of outlaws and murderous bandits that assemble below the international line, and, in hope of obtaining plunder and booty, ride across the line, murder our citizens, and then return to their rendezvous in Mexico. It has become tiresome for us to visit the War Department and to be told the same story, namely, that "your request will have consideration," and then see the officials of the War Department motor out to play golf or tennis instead of considering these questions.

I know as well as any man can know the future that unless judgment, courage, prudence, and preparedness are employed on the Mexican border there will be repetitions of the Columbus bloody outrages; and I for one want the Senate and the country to know that my colleague and I and Mr. HAYDEN, the Member of the House of Representatives from Arizona, have for eight and a half years constantly—inveterately—urged and pleaded with the War Department at least to protect the lives of citizens of the United States in the United States but adjacent to the border.

Mr. President, my resolution, stripped of its parliamentary verbiage, means that the Government of the United States, through the War Department, should assemble, at various points along the Mexican border, troops in sufficient numbers and in sufficient force to repel the aggressions of these murderous outlaws who take the lives of our citizens and destroy their property. Surely, I do not need to argue to the Senate of the United States that in a Republic such as ours an unlawful assault upon, or an unwarranted act of violence addressed toward, a citizen of the United States is an insult to the Government, because under our plan of government the people do or should constitute the Government. We have no entailed estates that constitute the Government. The people are the Government and the officers are the agents and servants of the Government. So, I repeat, an act of outlawry by the nationals of one nation directed toward our citizens on their own soil is an act of war.

And do I need to state that those who are honest are bound to confess that the Mexican question has been miserably and shamefully handled or mishandled? Is there one who will assert that the policy pursued for the past nine years has been a success? Let us then try a new course. Let us now begin to protect the rights of American citizens. Let us again begin to say that American citizens, in the United States at least, shall be safe from the aggressions of bandits who make their raid from Mexico.

There is no regret so keen, so poignant, that can come to a public official as to reflect that by his cowardice, by his supineness and his inaction, he has failed to protect the citizens of his own country from aggressions of bandits from an adjoining country. There is nothing that will wound the honor of a nation so deeply, that will stain its flag so indelibly, as to yield supinely to the aggressions of outlaws. "Yield nothing to the criminal aggressor" is a famous phrase, and I employ it here.

I want the Senate and the country to know that I believe the citizens of my State along the Mexican border are not only in peril but in imminent peril, that I have laid the facts before the War Department with tiresome repetition, and that I believe not only are the citizens along the border in my own State but that people in other States along that 1,400 miles of international line are in constant peril from Mexican outlaws, who I have reason to believe are assembling now with a view of devastating American ranches and plundering American homes, because, forsooth, the policy of the War Department for the past nine years has emboldened and encouraged the various contending factions in Mexico to believe that American lives may be sacrificed with impunity and that the only punishment they will receive will be to be "slapped on the wrist."

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield the floor.

Mr. FALL. I simply wanted to ask the Senator whether he had his attention called to the case of the State of Texas v. Aree (202 Southwestern Reporter)?

Mr. ASHURST. No, I will say to the Senator. If I have read the case I have forgotten the substance of it.

Mr. FALL. In that case the Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas decided during these outrages against which the Senator himself, as well as others, are protesting, that, as a matter of fact, Carranza was waging war upon the United States, and they turned the murderers loose after they had been convicted of the murder of our citizens.

Mr. ASHURST. I have the highest respect for that court.

Before I conclude let me say something for the benefit of Democratic Senators. The Democratic platform is an excellent guide; it is my pole star; and in 1912 the Democratic national platform said this:

The constitutional rights of American citizens should protect them on our borders and go with them throughout the world, and every American citizen residing or having property in any foreign country is entitled to and must be given the full protection of the United States Government, both for himself and his property.

Mr. President, upon that declaration we secured many votes from the American electorate, and any expression that is good enough upon which to get votes is good enough to live by.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Arizona has made a very forcible statement of the conditions existing between the United States and the Republic of Mexico for the last five years. As he has stated, he has not set forth the facts as he could, for they are much stronger. He has a great deal more information than I have upon the subject, representing a State upon the border, as he does.

There is no question but what he is right, that our relations with Mexico constitute the most discreditable and humiliating chapter of our foreign-relations history, and that there ought to be some action to protect the citizens of the United States within her own borders, who, he says, are being murdered and robbed constantly, as others will be in the course of events, if there is not more vigorous action upon the part of our Government.

From statements made upon this floor by other Senators, representing border States, hundreds of our citizens have been murdered, women have been outraged, and their property, worth millions of dollars, taken and destroyed, in the Republic of Mexico, where they were invited and encouraged to go. I think the resolution of the Senator is far from meeting the situation.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHIELDS. Let me finish this sentence. It is far from meeting the situation. I do not believe in sticking in the bark in this business. We have had ample cause for war with Mexico for five years, and the resolution ought to be one declaring war against Mexico. The safety of our people in the border States and the honor of our country demand it. There have been administrations in this country which under conditions stated by the Senators would long since have had Carranza and his associates hung as murderers.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it will be perceived from a glance at my resolution that I have specifically confined it to the protection of citizens within the United States. I am even doubtful, Mr. President, if I can get this resolution passed through Congress. Much more do I doubt whether I could get a resolution passed providing that American citizens who go to Mexico shall not be obliged to seek shelter under the flag of Haiti, Panama, and Liberia when an offense is threatened against them. If I had any idea that the Senate and the House would pass a resolution requiring the executive arm of this Government to protect the rights of our citizens in Mexico I would certainly introduce it. All I hope to do—and I would like to do more—is to try to induce the Senate and the House to direct the War Department at least to protect those American citizens who are in the United States. If I do that I will have at least punctured the lethargy of the departments who have so grievously mishandled this question. It is a regret for me to say this, because these men belong to my own party; but the truth must not longer be withheld. No man in America can rise and expect to have an audience of intelligent people agree with him when he says the departments have made a creditable record in handling the Mexican situation. All people except babes in their cradles know we have been weak, vacillating, negligent, and cowardly in regard to our duty toward Mexico, and I for one Senator will stand it no longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Without objection, the resolution of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE MEXICAN SITUATION.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I send to the desk a concurrent resolution, which I ask to have read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 21), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the action taken by the Department of State in reference to the pending controversy between this Government and the Government of Mexico should be approved; and, further, that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to withdraw from Venustiano Carranza the recognition heretofore accorded him by the United States as President of the Republic of Mexico and to sever all diplomatic relations now existing between this Government and the pretended government of Carranza.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, of course one who offers a resolution of this character must be prepared to make some statement concerning it. The morning hour, however, has nearly expired, and I shall only say that this resolution is offered after the most mature consideration, on evidence which will, in my judgment, astound the people of the United States when it is produced.

I have listened to the discussion with reference to revolutionary doctrines being preached in this country as that discussion has proceeded this morning, and I may say to you that it is because of the fact that the condition is more serious than you realize it is, in my judgment, in our own country, and because it is being fostered by the Mexican Government directly, that this resolution is now offered.

I charge that the Mexican Embassy in Washington, that the Mexican consul generalship in New York, the Mexican consul generalship in San Francisco, and the consuls along the border and in other portions of the United States are deliberately stirring revolutionary troubles, that they are engaged in Bolshevik propaganda, and that their action is indorsed by Venustiano Carranza himself, and that the evidence can not be controverted, although my statement will doubtless be denied by those who are assisting in the Carranza propaganda.

I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so referred.

PAYMENT FOR COAL DIVERTED IN TRANSIT.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 243) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Director General of Railroads be directed to report to the Senate at the earliest practicable moment what arrangements have been made, or will be made, for the prompt payment for coal diverted in transit from the original consignees, presumably in the public interest, in order that those mines still producing coal can continue to meet their pay rolls and continue the production of coal.

POLL ON LEAGUE AND TREATY.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a statement of the result of a vote cast by the readers of the Sun, one of the leading papers of Baltimore, with regard to the peace treaty and the league of nations. I ask that the letter and statement may be printed in the RECORD. They are very short.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BALTIMORE, MD., December 2, 1919.

Hon. JOHN WALTER SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: You will find inclosed a statement of the result of a vote cast by the readers of the Sun with regard to the peace treaty and the league of nations.

This vote was taken by the Sun in a serious attempt to secure an expression of opinion on this most important subject from the people in the territory in which this paper circulates. The ballots were printed in the Sun for a week and a day. They were returned from all sections of the city of Baltimore and from all parts of Maryland. They demonstrate, we believe, a sincere interest in the question on the part of the voters, for each individual who voted was put to the trouble of clipping the ballot from the paper, marking and signing it, and then either bringing it to the Sun office or stamping and mailing it.

All of the four questions asked are self-explanatory, but of the fourth it may be said that it was framed to secure an expression of opinion on the one point which more than any other seems to stand in the way of a compromise settlement—whether the American people should or should not assume a moral obligation to support the provisions of article 10.

We believe that no Senator of the United States can be indifferent to the sentiment of his constituents on this subject, and these figures are therefore submitted to you for your candid consideration.

Very sincerely, yours, A. S. ABELL CO.,
Publishers of the Sun.

11,646 VOTED ON TREATY—FINAL COUNT SHOWS 11,014 FOR AND 558 AGAINST LEAGUE—RESULTS GOING TO SENATORS—POLLS OF THE SUN CLOSE AFTER SUBMITTING THE QUESTION TO THE PEOPLE.

"That the people of Maryland, in fact those of all the territory in which the Sun and the Evening Sun circulate, are overwhelmingly in favor of the treaty of Versailles and the league of nations covenant embodied in it, and without the Lodge reservations, was indicated by the poll on this subject which was concluded last night.

"The poll began on Monday morning, November 23. The ballot box was taken out of the Sun counting room at 8 o'clock last night, and the ballots which had come in during the course of the day through the mails and which had been deposited in the ballot box were counted and tabulated. The result of this tabulation will be sent to-day to United States Senators JOHN WALTER SMITH and JOSEPH IRWIN FRANCE as being as accurate a showing of the sentiment of their constituents as could possibly be secured.

20-TO-1 VOTE FOR THE LEAGUE.

"The total vote received up to 12 o'clock last night was 11,646.

"Of these 11,014 were in favor of the treaty and the league of nations and 558 were against them, or nearly 20 to 1.

"There were 10,717 in favor of the treaty without reservations that require the acceptance of other powers to 689 against.

"Those in favor of the Lodge reservations which require acceptance of other powers numbered 795 to 10,120 against.

"Those who were in favor of the United States assuming the moral obligations required by article 10 of the league covenant numbered 10,612 to 717 against.

QUESTION SUBMITTED TO ALL.

"In view of the fact that the Sun and the Evening Sun made special appeals to those opposed to the treaty and the league to cast their ballots and show how they felt, the result of the poll is considered remarkable, and truly representative of the opinion in this section of the country.

"The closing day of the poll brought out a very heavy vote, there having been 2,673 votes cast in the course of the day."

RURAL HOMES.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I introduce a bill.

The bill (S. 3477) to increase without expenditure of Federal funds the opportunities of the people to acquire rural homes, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desired at this time to make a short statement in relation to the bill, but I see that the hour of 2 o'clock has nearly arrived, and I shall not do so, because I understand that other Senators have business to present. I shall take an opportunity later to submit what I wish to say on the bill. I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UINTA RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask for immediate consideration of the following resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 244), as follows:

Whereas the Government, through the Secretary of the Interior, leased to a number of white citizens lands lying within the Uinta Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, and agreed by the terms of the leases made and entered into to furnish water for the irrigation of said lands; and

Whereas it is claimed by said lessees that the Government failed in the years 1916–1919 to furnish an adequate supply of water for the irrigation of said lands and the crops growing thereon, as a result of which said lessees claimed to have sustained damages and injuries; and

Whereas said lessees have been unable, though demands have been made, to secure compensation for said damages and injuries, and the representatives of the Government claim that there is no fund available to meet said demands or any of like character: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to furnish to the Senate information upon the following matters, to wit:

1. The number of leases or contracts entered into between the Government and citizens who have entered upon said Uinta Indian Reservation, and the terms and conditions of the same, together with the number of acres involved therein.

2. The claims made by the Government as to water and the resources of water supply for said lands, and whether the Government claimed sufficient water for the irrigation of said lands so leased to said citizens.

3. What statements and representations were made by the Government and its representatives when said leases and contracts were entered into for the lease of said lands, as to the ownership of water by the Government for the same, and what, if any, steps would be taken by the Government to supply water for the irrigation of said lands.

4. The quantity of water furnished to said lessees by the Government for the irrigation of said lands so leased, and whether the amount furnished was sufficient for the proper irrigation of said lands, in order to mature the crops thereon.

5. If the quantity of water supplied said lessees was insufficient for said purposes of irrigation, what reason is assigned for the same.

6. The total amount of claims presented to the Interior Department or its representatives by said lessees for damages sustained during above-mentioned years.

7. What, if any, investigation has been made by the Government to ascertain the damages sustained by said lessees because of the alleged failure of the Government to furnish water for the irrigation of said lands.

8. What, if any, funds are available to meet valid claims for damages sustained by settlers upon or lessees of any portion of said Indian reservation; and, if no funds are available for said purpose, in what manner may valid claims for damages for the failure of the Government to comply with the terms of said lessees be met and discharged.

Mr. KING. The resolution merely asks for certain information based upon demands for about $80,000 alleged to be due as damages to certain lessees of Indian lands in Utah, so that we may deal with the question intelligently and determine what course should be taken by Congress.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it the same matter that was presented to the committee a few weeks ago?

Mr. KING. No; it is a different matter. It asks for certain information in relation to contracts between the Government and certain persons who leased Indian lands and claim that the Government is in default.

Mr. CURTIS. It is on the Uinta Reservation?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. In Uinta County?

Mr. KING. In Uinta County.

Mr. CURTIS. As the resolution merely asks for information, I have no objection to it.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	France	New	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators.

Mr. HARRIS, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. MOSES, Mr. EDGE, Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. UNDERWOOD entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3288.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. CUMMINS, after having spoken, with interruptions, for nearly three hours and a half, said:

Mr. President, I had in the beginning very great hope that I would be able to finish what I had to say upon this subject to-night; but the hour is getting late, and I have been on my feet now for nearly three hours and a half. With the promise to Senators that I will finish very quickly to-morrow, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 4, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 3, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God Almighty, Father of all that we hold dear—life, liberty, truth, purity, justice, mercy, faith, hope, love, the sanctity of home with all its precious relationships, the dearest spot on earth.

Home! home! sweet, sweet home!
Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home.

From which sprang patriotism, for which millions down through the ages have died. We thank Thee for American patriotism which has brought thousands to the colors in every emergency.

Arouse that patriotism now, that our Constitution with all its sacred institutions may be upheld, maintained, amid the unrest and unwarranted speculations rife in our land. In the name of Him who taught us peace, brotherly love, tranquillity. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DUPRÉ (at the request of Mr. O'CONNOR), for seven days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BARBOUR, until December 15.

To Mr. STEELE (at the request of Mr. DEWALT), indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have received a letter from the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. CANDLER, requesting indefinite leave of absence on account of illness in his family.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the leave of absence will be granted.

There was no objection.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates as Speaker pro tempore for to-morrow the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on December 2 they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 9821. An act to amend an act entitled "An act relating to the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia," approved February 28, 1901, and for other purposes.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and the call rests with the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the call rests with the Committee on Naval Affairs, and will ask permission to address the House for one minute and then make a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, the Naval Affairs Committee is unable to present any work in the House to-day by reason of the great volume of work it has had to do for the past three or four months. I ask unanimous consent that the opportunity which the Naval Affairs Committee has to-day may be postponed for one week so that it will not lose its chance entirely, when we think we will be ready to report legislative matters that should be considered. I will supplement that by asking unanimous consent that the Military Affairs Committee which has some important matters on the calendar may have another day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the Military Affairs Committee may be allowed one more day and that the Naval Affairs Committee have the call on next Wednesday. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, as the request is made, what does it mean, that the Military Affairs Committee have another day?

The SPEAKER. The Military Affairs Committee has had the last two Wednesdays and the Chair understands that the request is that they shall have a third day.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does that mean that they shall have to-day?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; I made the request in exactly the language that I thought would bring the Military Affairs Committee in to-day.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming what bills the Military Affairs Committee intends to bring up?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], ranking member of the Military Committee, can inform the gentleman.

Mr. ANTHONY. There are a number of small bills, several of which are important. One of them restores the payment of six months' pay to the widows and children of officers who died in the service. That was inadvertently repealed when we adopted the war-risk insurance act. It is desired to restore that act.

Another bill provides for decoration devices or insignia and medals of honor awarded to discharged soldiers. There are several bills of that character.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. It having been the expressed policy of the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee [Mr. KAHN] for a large standing Army of about 500,000 men—I think that is the number he was in favor of—and a policy of a different kind having been indicated by Gen. Pershing and other distinguished military men of the country, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas what the House may expect in the way of legislation in the near future as to the size of the standing Army being reduced in accordance with the suggestions made by Gen. Pershing and other men of military genius?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say that the Committee on Military Affairs intends to go to work at once and prepare a reorganization bill which it is hoped will get before the House at a not far-distant day, and which will authorize a Regular Army of a much less number than stated by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The Military Affairs Committee does not feel bound in any way by the policy expressed by the chairman of the committee?

Mr. ANTHONY. That was not the policy of the chairman of the committee but of the Secretary of War.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; when the gentleman from California came back from Europe he gave out an interview——

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has stated on the floor that he was not in favor of an Army of 500,000 men.

Mr. BLANTON. I have newspaper statements of an interview that he gave out when he first came back from Europe that he was in favor of an Army of that size.

Mr. ANTHONY. He was in favor of an Army of a much smaller size.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving further the right to object, in reply to the gentleman from Kansas I would state that the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] resisted with all of his might the effort on the part of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] to reduce the number of the standing Army, which is a fact well known to every Member who was then on the floor of the House. He fought with all of the vigor of his ability the effort of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask the gentleman from Kansas how many bills the Military Committee intend to dispose of to-day.

Mr. ANTHONY. We have five bills that we would like to dispose of to-day.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then the gentleman will want the entire day? Will the gentleman mind naming the bills?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have named two of them.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Well, give us the other three.

Mr. ANTHONY. Another bill authorizes the Secretary of War to give aircraft engines and aeronautical equipment to schools and colleges for instruction purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is three.

Mr. ANTHONY. Another is a joint resolution relating to the induction of registrants who applied and were accepted for induction and assigned to educational institutions for special and technical training, but whose induction, without fault of their own, was not completed. This is to give those men the rights of enlisted men, to which they are entitled.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What is the fifth bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. Another is a joint resolution authorizing the giving of credit for service in junior and senior divisions of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. It gives certain men who have taken that instruction their proper status.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And the gentleman thinks that it will take practically all of the day to dispose of those bills?

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course that would depend entirely upon the amount of debate.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I want to state that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has a bill which has been pending here for months. The committee this morning instructed the acting chairman to call that bill up on the call of committees when that committee was reached.

The Committee on Military Affairs has already had two days. It has been utterly impossible for us to get that bill up, although it means the saving of many thousands of dollars to the Government. I shall have to object to this unanimous consent.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman will reserve that objection. I do not think the legislation to which the gentleman refers will be delayed any by the action that has been requested. I think that legislation should be taken up without waiting for Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say that, but why is it that we can not get any rule to consider that bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I think we will be able to do that. There are quite a number of bills on the calendar that ought to be considered quite soon, and that is one of them.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Would the gentleman object to our committee asking unanimous consent to-morrow or any day this week to take up that bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I doubt if it can be taken up by unanimous consent, but I think an arrangement can be made to take it up in the near future.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What is the "near future"?

Mr. MONDELL. It is my expectation to have that bill taken up in the no distant future, at least before the holiday recess.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. At least before that?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then I shall not object.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand that these five bills mentioned by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] include all of the bills that have been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and that are now on the calendar?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is my understanding that there are other bills perhaps on the calendar, but these five are those that we have thought of sufficient importance to take up the time of the House now.

Mr. MONDELL. These have not been objected to by anyone and are unanimously reported.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not our intention to call up any other.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. I think I ought to be perfectly frank with the gentleman. There is the bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs that would be in order to call up to-day, if the House desires to consider it, concerning which gentlemen have been before the Committee on Rules. I do not see any reason why the Committee on Rules should have pressure turned upon it when the Committee on Military Affairs has the right under the calendar to call the bill up now. I am not going to object to this unanimous consent, but I suggest to the gentleman that he may very well consider whether he should confine himself to these five bills, or whether or not, when the opportunity is presented to get certain measures up under the general rules of the House, it is fair to withhold them and then insist on a special rule for their consideration?

Mr. ANTHONY. I would say to the gentleman that if we can dispose of these five bills I would have no objection, for one member of the committee, to taking up any other military bills that are on the calendar.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman intend to take up these bills in the order named?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is one thing that we would like to know. Is the gentleman going to confine this day to these five bills mentioned or are you going to take snap judgment and bring up some others?

Mr. ANTHONY. I would imagine that if we do not consume the entire day it would be in order to take up any other bill on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think we should have a definite understanding in reference to the Crowder bill. If the Committee on Military Affairs is going to come before the Committee on Rules for a rule to consider that bill, I think they must consider it important. If they are going to do that, why would it not be right at the proper time to call it up during that time rather than come before the Committee on Rules for a special rule?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman personally I do not favor calling up the bill mentioned. There may be other members of the committee who do——

Mr. SNELL. I think it is proper at this time to have an understanding in regard to this bill. There has been considerable pressure put on the Committee on Rules for a rule for the consideration of that bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will permit me to call his attention to the parliamentary status of that bill, I think he will agree that it will dispose of the question in his mind. The bill to promote Gen. Crowder on the retired list is on the Private Calendar and can not be called up at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand it the Committee on Military Affairs have simply been granted another day, and that on next Wednesday the call will rest with the Committee on Naval Affairs?

The SPEAKER. Exactly.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the gentleman; my request was that we should have the right of way next Wednesday.

SIX MONTHS' PAY TO DEPENDENTS OF DECEASED ARMY MEN.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs I call up the bill S. 2497.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar. Automatically the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] to take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2497, with Mr. GOOD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2497, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 2497. An act to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relative of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter, immediately upon official notification of the death from wounds or disease, not the result of his own misconduct, of any officer or enlisted man on the active list of the Regular Army or on the retired list when on active duty, from and after October 6, 1917, the Quartermaster General of the Army shall cause to be paid to the widow, and if there be no widow to the child or children, and if there be no widow or child to any other dependent relative of such officer or enlisted man previously designated by him, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer or enlisted man at the date of his death. The Secretary of War shall establish regulations requiring each officer and enlisted man having no wife or child to designate the proper dependent relative to whom this amount shall be paid in case of his death. Said amount shall be paid from funds appropriated for the pay of the Army.

SEC. 2. That nothing in this act or in other existing legislation shall be construed as making the provisions of this act applicable to officers or enlisted men of any forces or troops of the Army of the United States other than those of the Regular Army, and nothing in this act shall be construed to apply in commissioned grades to any officers except those holding permanent or provisional appointments in the Regular Army.

SEC. 3. That the sum received hereunder shall be deducted from any amount that may be, or may become, due and payable to any such widow, child, children, or dependent relative of such officer or enlisted man under the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, or any act or acts amendatory thereof.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 3, strike out the word "hereafter" and insert the words "from and after October 6, 1917."

Page 1, line 7, after the word "duty," strike out "from and after October 6, 1917."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, previous to October 6, 1917, there was a law on the statute books that authorized and permitted the widows and dependent children of officers of the Army a gratuity of six months' pay in case of death of such officer not caused by his own misconduct. When we passed the war-risk insurance act this provision was repealed. The War Department is strongly of the opinion, and the Committee on Military Affairs is also of the opinion, that in justice to the officers and soldiers of the Regular Army this gratuity of six months' pay on the death of such officer or enlisted man should be again authorized. It covers both branches of the personnel, commissioned and enlisted. The amendment which was made by the Senate providing that such payment should be deducted from any insurance which the officer may have carried was considered by the committee to have been an injustice because of the fact that it penalizes the man who paid the Government for insurance in favor of the man who did not carry Government insurance. So the committee believes section 3 should be stricken out.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. DUNBAR. According to section 2, page 2, the provisions of this act apply only to those of the Regular Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is correct.

Mr. DUNBAR. Why does it not apply to all officers and soldiers?

Mr. ANTHONY. This legislation is intended to cover officers of the regular service who devote their entire lives to their military work for the country. It is a well-known fact that officers of the Army are not always provident, and frequently when they die in the service their families are not cared for.

Mr. DUNBAR. This act will not apply to officers or soldiers engaged in the late war?

Mr. ANTHONY. It will not; it is intended to cover the Regular Army.

Mr. DUNBAR. Is there any provision intended to be made for officers and soldier of the late war?

Mr. ANTHONY. The war-risk insurance act was passed to cover that.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HULINGS. I have in mind a case where a young officer who was on duty with his battalion at target practice after the target practice was over got into his automobile to go back to his house, and the automobile overturned and he was killed. Would this bill cover such a case as that?

Mr. ANTHONY. Was the officer referred to an officer of the Regular Army?

Mr. HULINGS. He was.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would say, in my opinion, it would cover such a case where the officer was being transported to and from his official duty.

Mr. HULINGS. He was going back and forth in his own automobile. His duty for the day was over.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would cover every case where it is not his own misconduct.

Mr. HULINGS. Well, I do not read it so, exactly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the fact.

Mr. HULINGS. This says from "wounds received not the result of his own misconduct."

Mr. ANTHONY. I think heretofore the law has been so construed as to cover cases like that which the gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. HULINGS. Why do you make a discrimination between a man who was killed who happens to be in the Regular Army and one who has been in the National Guard or a drafted man?

Mr. ANTHONY. I just made the statement that the law is intended to cover officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army who have been devoting their entire lives to the service of the Government, many of whom are not always provident in making provision for their families.

Mr. HULINGS. Suppose a National Guard officer has not been provident, either?

Mr. ANTHONY. A National Guard officer is supposed to be engaged in a gainful occupation.

Mr. HULINGS. Suppose the fact is that he has not been, and he leaves his family in destitute circumstances. He has given up his life, and that is all the Regular Army man has done.

Mr. ANTHONY. He has given up his life after a few days each year devoted to military duty, but he is not in the same circumstances as the Regular officer who devotes his entire time to military duty.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the purpose of giving this to the officer and enlisted man of the Regular Establishment is a part of the regular policy on which the retirement law is based. These men, as the gentleman from Kansas has said, give their entire life to military duty and have no other gainful occupation, and in the meantime their families reside at the posts with them. As soon as an officer or enlisted man has died or is disabled or is retired from the service his family have no claim on the garrison and they have to move, and this has served as a temporary allowance to the family to prepare them to return to such station as they may take up in civil life.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to ask the acting chairman of the committee the reason of the limitation expressed here on the first page, of "from and after October 1, 1917." I know there is reason for it.

Mr. ANTHONY. October 1, 1917, was the date of the passage of the war-risk act, which repealed this law. Between that date and this there have been a number of very deserving cases, where the applications of the widows for payment of this gratuity are pending, and which the committee felt should be taken care of.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. Let me ask the gentleman if this gratuity is in addition to the compensation under the war-risk act as to an officer who died during the continuance of the war?

Mr. ANTHONY. My understanding is that if the officer carried insurance under that act his family would be entitled to the full amount of the insurance.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am speaking about the compensation.

Mr. ANTHONY. Would the family be entitled to the compensation?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. The widow would be entitled to compensation or a pension in addition to this six months' pay, in my judgment.

Mr. GANLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. GANLY. Do you not think the nurses who volunteered their services ought to be included in this bill also?

Mr. ANTHONY. You mean those who served during the war?

Mr. GANLY. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I explained this legislation is intended to cover the Regular Army only, and not to go into the question of rewards for service during the late war.

Mr. GANLY. These women were practically a part of the Regular Army and were taking care of the men who were injured in the war, and I think ought to be provided for in this bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. And they are covered by the war-risk insurance, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. GANLY. I think they ought to be provided for in this bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. As I understand this matter—and I ask for information—this bill is designed to restore what might be called a permanent policy of the Government and make these provisions for officers and enlisted men in the Regular Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And as to volunteer officers and enlisted men in the recent war, as I understand, Congress endeavored to make provisions for them in the war-risk insurance act?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is correct.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And this, so far as it is concerned, would only restore what was the policy before?

Mr. ANTHONY. And which the war-risk act took away from the officers and enlisted men.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And permit Army officers, most of whom will not carry insurance in the future, at least under the war risk, because it is not possible for them to do it—and they would be foolish if they did it—to have this gratuity for their families if they die under the circumstances mentioned?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is a very clear statement.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is no lack of provision for the care of the officers and men who have been in the Army during the war—the volunteers. That has been provided for, supposedly, by the war-risk insurance act. Now, if the gentleman will yield a little further.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I say this bill provides that this act shall take effect from the date the war-risk insurance act became a law. So far as the time between that date and the present is concerned, this bill makes a pure gift to the Regular Army officers who might have been protected under the war-risk insurance act, and those who were so protected get a double gift from the Government. I do not know how much that amounts to. While I believe this is the permanent policy of the Government, I have some doubt about whether it should be duplicated together with the war-risk insurance benefits to the families of those who died between the date of October, 1917, and the present date. They get a double gratuity, practically.

Mr. ANTHONY. The committee felt if we deducted this sum from any amount they received under the war-risk act, that we would put a premium upon officers not taking out insurance under the war-risk act.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I quite agree with the action of the committee in striking out section 3 as to the future, because under section 3 of the Senate bill, if an Army officer carried insurance he was penalized by the Government for carrying the insurance. I do not think very many of them are going to carry much insurance in the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and I think we ought to go out of that business so far as the Regular Army officers are concerned; but I do not believe in penalizing them. But between October, 1917, and up to date we double the gift. If they get the benefits of the war-risk insurance, then you give them the six months' pay in addition.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the point made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] is the same point that I have been trying to express for some time. Unless the committee has some excellent reason as to why the officers in the Regular Army and the men of the Regular Army should receive gifts during the war in addition to what is given them in common with all other soldiers, I should favor the amendment of this legislation so as to make it begin with the close of the war. I can see the good sense of restoring the law as it was before. To that I would make no violent objection. But I am not familiar with any code of equity or of good sense which would give to the people in the Regular Army a fund additional to that which was given by this war legislation to the people who went into the Army solely for the purpose of fighting.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will my colleague let me put the matter to him in this light? Far be it from me to minimize the service of those outside of the Regular Army during the last war. But assuming that the officer or soldier of the Regular Army and the soldier from civil life went into the war on the same footing exactly, many of the Regular officers in addition to that war service have given to the country from 15 to 20 and 25 years of previous service, and it is for that service that we are giving them this recognition.

Mr. LITTLE. Then I am against the proposition. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Government, after giving them thousands and thousands of dollars to sit around and go through the motions of getting ready for war, should now add to what it has been giving them? They have been paid for all these services in advance for many years. In time of peace they did not have much to do. We were maintaining the Regular Army, Mr. Chairman, so that its members would be ready for war when war came. Now, they come around and say, "You have been getting us ready for years, and we want extra pay for the service we have rendered." Along comes another man who went into the war when the time of war actually came, not as a life profession, not with the idea of getting a gratuity all his life and being paid off and continuing to be paid until he dies, but a man acting purely out of patriotism, who makes the same sacrifice, though not as a professional soldier, and you are going to penalize him by discriminating against him in favor of the professional soldier. That is not an equitable proposition, in my opinion.

There is a great difference, gentlemen, between the professional soldier who has a life job at a regular salary and permanent employment, with retired pay, and a man that simply goes into the war to fight for his country. He ruins his business when he goes out, and for a time after he comes back again, and if there ought to be any difference it ought to be made in favor of the temporary soldier who goes out through patriotism and not of the professional soldier who has a life job. I am opposed to this legislation on that principle.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I understand this is simply a return to what was the original law?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. It is not a gratuity for war service at all. It is a gratuity to the officer's family in consideration of years of devotion previously to the Government on the part of the officer.

Mr. SNELL. How did this happen to be repealed?

Mr. ANTHONY. It was repealed in the war-risk insurance act, which repealed all laws in conflict with it.

Mr. SNELL. Then we are simply reenacting the old law?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; we are simply reenacting the old law.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I might say that the passage of this law will not have anything to do with the war-risk insurance. It is not the intention of the committee that it shall have any effect on the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not at all.

Mr. RAYBURN. This was not repealed inadvertently. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce brought into this House a bill that applied to officers and enlisted men, and an amendment was offered here by my colleague [Mr. BLACK], from Texas, which was voted for by everybody in the House except the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] and myself, on the plea that this was a democratic Army that we were raising, and that a private in it ought to be paid the same compensation as a major general, and it went out on the floor. It was not done through inadvertence at all.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I was trying to ascertain, whether or not it was done through inadvertence?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It was done through ignorance.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Kansas will yield just for a moment, I do not think the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] ought to go absolutely unchallenged. The proposition in the war-risk insurance bill went much farther than this proposition. It provided that the widows of officers should continue to draw a very much larger portion from the United States Treasury than the widows of enlisted men, and it was graduated from second lieutenant on up, and the higher the grade of the officer the more his widow would get; and I remember very distinctly that this House took the position that we could not discriminate between American citizens, and I think the judgment of the House at that time was very wise. But it has no connection whatever with this proposition.

Mr. RAYBURN. It does have, for the simple reason that the war-risk insurance act provided that the man shall not draw compensation if he is drawing service pay and retirement pay. It comes in place of the compensation from the war-risk insurance.

Mr. McKENZIE. That would be discretionary. If the gentleman from Kansas will yield further, I may say that this is simply a proposition to enable the widow or children of an Army officer who may be stationed a long way from home to get back home and get located after the death of the officer. For instance, the home of an officer's wife may be somewhere in Connecticut, and she may have been stationed at Fort D. A. Russell, in Wyoming; and this is, you might say, a death benefit, to enable the widow or children to tide over an exigency temporarily. The war-risk proposition meant that they should continue to draw from the Treasury of the United States without limit these much larger sums.

Mr. RAYBURN. How much will the widow of a major general draw under this, if it passes?

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BEGG. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if it is not a fact that there were thousands of men who volunteered at the opening of the war and went, not into the National Army or the National Guard, but into the Regular Army, for the period of three or four years?

Mr. ANTHONY. They volunteered for service in the Regular Army.

Mr. BEGG. There were thousands of them?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. And every one of those men who went into the Regular Army would be benefited under this law, even though he had volunteered for the emergency, would he not?

Mr. ANTHONY. If he was a part of the Regular Establishment he would benefit by this.

Mr. BEGG. Then he would have decidedly the best of it as against a volunteer in the National Army or the National Guard?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; but the man who enlisted in the regular service bound himself for three years, and he is in the Army to-day.

Mr. BEGG. If he had not died or been killed he would have been bound for the term of his enlistment?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Then, in other words, you are willing to give his dependents a bonus of six months' pay over the boy who volunteered in the National Army just because one of them enlisted for three years as against the other who enlisted for the limit of the war?

Mr. ANTHONY. The idea is to give encouragement to men to enlist in the regular service.

Mr. BEGG. Then really if it is an encouragement——

Mr. ANTHONY. Not a discrimination, but to hold out an inducement to men to enlist in the regular service.

Mr. BEGG. Then it is really an inducement for men to enlist in the Regular Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is what properly it should be considered.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman inform the committee what is going to be the cost of this legislation to the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not recollect that we had the figures upon that before us. I do not believe it will run very high.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate that it is apparently a very unimportant detail in passing legislation what the draft upon the Treasury of the United States is going to amount to, but I did think that this great Committee on Military Affairs might have some statistics upon that subject.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What would those statistics relate to? They would have to relate to an actuary's table of expectation of life for those who enlist in the Regular Army.

Mr. WALSH. I am talking about the men who have already died up to the present time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think it runs into any large amount.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. If the bill is designed to encourage enlistments in the regular service, why is it made retroactive?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is made retroactive as a matter of justice——

Mr. HUSTED. I understood it was to induce men to enter the Regular Army.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not entirely that. It undoubtedly will be an inducement to them to know that their families will be taken care of to the extent of six months' pay; but the reason this is made retroactive is to take care of a number of very deserving cases that have come up, which the committee felt should be taken care of.

Mr. HUSTED. Does not the gentleman imagine that there are as many deserving cases, if not more, among those not in the regular service than there are among those who were actually in the regular service?

Mr. ANTHONY. They may be just as deserving, but they are not on the same plane.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. There has been a little confusion in regard to this bill, and I should like to ask the gentleman if this is the correct line of thought which we may have upon it: If this proposed bill is passed, will it not reduce these men to the same status, so far as the gratuity is concerned, as they would have been if the act of November 17 had not been passed?

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman is correct. It gives them the same status which they had before the war.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from Kansas mean that they can not collect any insurance?

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. WALSH. Then, of course, they are not upon the same footing at all.

Mr. HICKS. In so far as the gratuity is concerned, they are on the same footing. The gentleman's answer to that was "yes," was it not?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. I should like to get this matter clear. Our Army was divided into three groups. We had a group of divisions known as the Regular Army group. Then we had a group of divisions known as the National Guard group, and we had the National Army group. Now, I understand that in the process of demobilization the National Army divisions have all been demobilized and the National Guard divisions have all been demobilized——

Mr. McKENZIE. There are still some units which remain.

Mr. KREIDER. But the Regular Army group has been retained, to a certain extent at least.

Mr. ANTHONY. What the gentleman says is true in a general way. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] says, there are some units which still remain, in some of the other groups.

Mr. KREIDER. But that is the general proposition?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. Now, this bill would apply only to officers in the Regular Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. Officers and enlisted men.

Mr. KREIDER. What about officers of the Regular Army who are assigned to commands in the National Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. They do not lose their status as Regular Army officers no matter what divisions they have been assigned to. If they were commanding National Army troops or National Guard troops, they still maintain their original status in the Regular Army.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I simply want to enter a protest against what apparently is a discrimination as against the volunteers and the National Guard in favor of the Regular Army men.

For the life of me, I can not see that there is any rational reason why that discrimination should be made here. The volunteer is entitled to the same treatment as is the man who entered the Regular Army.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is intended to cover the Regular Establishment in time of peace.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Is it anticipated that any further legislation will be had on the subject of treating the cases of these men in the other two divisions who lost their lives?

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope that Congress will make the most liberal provision for such cases.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I want to say that I was in conference with an officer at the Walter Reed Hospital. He was in the Volunteer Army. He informed me that the War Department had practically ordered him out of the camp, that they could not do anything more for him, and he would have to get out. He could not be put on the retired list, and he would not be entitled to the pay that the Regular Army officer would be entitled to. That aroused the feeling in my mind that there is a discrimination and has been in the legislation of this country, and now in this legislation you propose a discrimination in favor of the Regular Army man as against the men in other divisions, and against that action I protest as seriously as I know how.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman kindly advise us how many cases are affected by this retroactive provision?

Mr. ANTHONY. We have not that definite information.

Mr. GARD. Are there any?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; but not a large number.

Mr. GARD. Can the gentleman give us the information approximately?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; I can not. The only way we could reach it would be to compare the number of cases that have happened in the Regular Army in time of peace with the number of officers serving during the war. I will say that the total amount will not be large. Personally I do not believe that this retroactive feature will take more than a few hundred thousand dollars out of the Treasury, but that is merely my opinion.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. CONNALLY. I would like to ask the gentleman about this feature of the bill. This applies both to officers and enlisted men in the Regular Army. In all Regular divisions there were a great many replacements from the National Army and from the National Guard, and I would like to ask the gentleman if these men would get the benefit of this provision?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; they would not. They were serving under different enlistments. They were serving for the period of war, while the Regular Army men were serving for a full period of three years.

Mr. CONNALLY. Under the retroactive feature of the bill the family of the Regular Army officer who died would get not only the compensation under the war-risk insurance act but the compensation provided for the Reserve and National Army.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. In passing the Black amendment to the war-risk insurance act, which passed the House by an overwhelming vote, the House thereby announced its policy that it recognized when a man gave his life to his country, whether on the battle field or not, whether he was a private or an officer, he gave everything on earth of value that he had; that in giving his life, the private gave as much as the officer, and that his wife should be remunerated in the same amount. If that is the announced policy of this House and of this Congress, because the Senate approved of that provision, why should this discrimination now be made in this bill. In other words, why should we announce a policy in one piece of legislation that an officer's widow and children should not receive any more than the widow and children of a private, based on the death of the husband, and then in this proposed legislation announce a new and different policy that an officer's widow should receive in some cases twenty times more for the death of her husband than the widow of a private did for the death of hers?

Mr. ANTHONY. For the same reason that an officer receives more salary than the private. The gentleman would not propose to level all salaries.

Mr. BLANTON. But salaries are for services rendered in the lifetime. When a man gives his life to the service of his country and the flag of his country, he is giving everything he possesses, and the private gives just as much as the officer. Death is a leveler of all persons and of all positions.

Mr. ANTHONY. According to the gentleman's argument, he would give the wife of a Member of Congress who died no more than he would give the wife of a Doorkeeper of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. I know that Congress pays the widow of a Congressman $7,500, but I am not in favor of it; I am against that policy. But even under that pernicious custom, Congress does not pay the widow of the most prominent member of the great Ways and Means Committee one single cent more than the widow of the obscurest member. But we have already announced the policy that we would not give the widow and children of an officer more than the widow and children of a private. I say to be consistent we ought to continue that policy in this legislation. Would the gentleman have any objection to an amendment to that effect?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it would be objectionable.

Mr. BLANTON. If my colleague, Mr. BLACK, who succeeded in getting passed that splendid piece of legislation in relation to the war-risk insurance act, does not offer the amendment, I will do so.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. KINCHELOE. As far as I am concerned, I am in favor of restoring the permanent law to the Regular Army that was repealed by the act of October 6, 1917, but it is very apparent, under this bill, that this retroactive feature is a mere gratuity to the officers and privates of the Regular Army, because they were beneficiaries under the war-risk insurance act the same as the National Army.

In view of that fact, would not the gentleman agree to strike out the words "October 6, 1917," and insert "November 11, 1918," and in that way put them all on the same basis?

Mr. ANTHONY. I would say that would not be advisable, in my judgment. We are not trying to reward war service at all. I think it is better not to take into consideration any war service. The idea of this gratuity is to take care of the officer or the man for his long period of service in the Army outside of the war.

Mr. KINCHELOE. But when he goes into the Regular Army he goes in gratuitously, and takes up the life as a matter of living or profession.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. And now you propose to give this gratuity to them and distinguish between them and the men who were conscripted and who voluntarily went in to save this country.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not at all.

Mr. KINCHELOE. It is nothing but a gratuity.

Mr. ANTHONY. If there are no more questions, I desire to yield 20 minutes now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO]. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-five minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO].

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY. On what subject?

Mr. CRAGO. On the subject of Camp Benning. I am asking for this much time of the House to discuss briefly a matter that will come before the House in the next few days.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I hold no brief in defense of the administration of our war endeavors of the past few years other than the inclination and desire which should guide any loyal American, namely, to uphold what is right, condemning only that which has been proven not only to be wrong but fundamentally wrong, and which could have been avoided. I am satisfied that much money has been needlessly wasted because of demands made by different political interests, principally in southern sections, where nearly every small city demanded that some money should be expended with them; and it must have taxed the ingenuity of the department at times to find some excuse for locating some of our activities at points where we find them. Because of this fact, however, I am not willing to utter a general denouncement. On the other hand, I believe a wonderful work has been done, and the war brought to a more speedy conclusion by reason of the fact that the Central Powers knew we were willing to go the limit; and even the fact that we were wasting much money but were doing it willingly in order that nothing might be left undone, had its impress on our enemy, who knew what we were doing, and who knew our vast resources which we were determined to use against them. The fact that even after the armistice we did go ahead with many projects, which some people think should have been immediately abandoned, had its psychological effect, and compelled our enemies to agree to conditions they would not have agreed to had they known we had stopped preparation entirely.

I want to retrench in our expenditures and lessen the burdensome taxes, but I think we will be shortsighted if we do not take advantage of what we have learned in this war, and I believe we can justify from an economic standpoint the finishing of many of our projects, even though they were begun as war measures and uncompleted when the war closed.

A subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs has been making a careful study at first-hand of many of these uncompleted projects, and you will hear later from all of these.

The Artillery School at Camp Bragg, near Fayetteville, N. C., is one of the uncompleted projects which, in my judgment, should be continued. At this place, where we have taken over vast areas of land, and blotted out the local life of the community and have not paid for land which we contracted to buy, questions involving good faith on the part of the Government should be determined at once. The facts in detail as to this project will be given by others. The retention of some of our aviation fields and supply depots I hope to speak of later.

There is before Congress a bill carrying authority to appropriate certain unexpended balances of expenditures heretofore made to complete certain of these projects started as war projects by the Secretary of War before the date of the armistice, but which now, in the opinion of the War Department, should be completed for our peace-time establishment under the national defense act. One of the most important of all of these projects, in my opinion, is the Camp Benning project, carrying an appropriation of $2,328,000, in round numbers, for the completion of the Infantry school located there. This amount, in my judgment, can be materially reduced, and we will still be able to carry out the project.

No other single appropriation in the conduct of the War Department has called forth such virulent criticism on the head of the Secretary of War as the handling of this project, and no other project has come to us with the real facts so distorted. The data which I give has been furnished by officers of the Army who are familiar with the project, but a careful personal study of the location and plan convinces me of the wisdom not only of the location but of our retaining what we have and of finishing a part, at least, of the construction program.

No one after listening to Gen. Malone, who commanded infantry so ably in actual battle in France, can fail to realize the necessity for this training field, and I give him full credit for the presentation of the necessity for intensive training of this important arm of the service.

Conceived as a perfectly legitimate plan for locating a cantonment of approximately 30,000 troops in the southeastern part of the United States, a site was selected by Gen. Wood near Columbus, Ga., in June, 1917. There was no question then of the willingness of America to pour out her billions with lavish hand to vindicate her ideals on the battle fields of Europe. No matter what might have been asked, the amount would have been given. But a year passed and no action was taken. Several boards seeking sites for various activities had in the meantime reported favorably upon the Columbus site, and in July, 1918, Majs. Solomon and Gibbs proceeded to Columbus, Ga., to select a building site for a cantonment for about 30,000 officers and men, which would be suitable for any one of the many uses for which Columbus had been recommended. On September 12 the Chief of Staff approved the project of placing the "Infantry School of Arms" at Columbus, Ga., and removing thereto the "Infantry School of Arms" at Fort Sill, forced out of that location because of the demand of the Artillery for all of the space available. At the same time the Small Arms Firing School from Camp Perry, Ohio, and the Machine Gun School from Augusta, Ga., were transferred to Columbus, thus bringing together in a single place the means of instructing the infantry soldier in the use of his principal arms, a result accomplished in France under the direction of Gen. Pershing as one of the very first acts of his creative genius after establishing his headquarters overseas.

Inexplicable as it may seem, the actual condemnation proceedings to acquire this all-important tract for the training of infantry soldiers on a plan commensurate with our share of the World War were not entered until November 2, 1918, so late that the plan was caught in its infancy by the declaration of the armistice nine days later.

Up to this time the War Department had exhibited an incomprehensible lack of appreciation of the fundamental needs in infantry training.

The armistice should have found this project a completed and highly developed school of training, turning out leaders of the subordinate units whose knowledge would have helped to win battles, not to lead butcheries. Instead, we find fairly good installation for the training of all arms except the infantry, the one great arm on which victory ultimately depends.

Possibly, appreciating the error that had been made by the delay, the Secretary allowed the work to progress, and finally appealed to the Military Affairs Committee of the House and Senate for advice and counsel. Congress is familiar with the controversy which has arisen over the action which he subsequently took. The project was pushed until June, 1919—further construction and purchase of land were arrested by resolution of Congress.

The project stands to-day 60 to 65 per cent complete.

Roughly, 77,000 acres of land out of a total project of 97,000 acres have been bought and paid for, and the remaining land is under contract or condemnation proceedings, and no matter what happens the Nation must pay for the remaining 20,000 acres. Buildings have been planned or erected for a garrison and for student personnel, numbering about 6,000, this to meet the needs for infantry instruction of the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Reserve Corps under the national defense act.

A total of $6,870,000 has been expended, and the War Department comes before us with a request that the unexpended balance of the appropriation already made to the sum of $2,329,000 be made available for the completion of this project.

Now, granted that the project, and all others associated with it, were handled unwisely, admitted that there may have been bad faith and even positive deception in the management of the project, yet the question is squarely up to Congress, which is charged with final decision on questions of national defense. Shall this question be decided in a spirit of small revenge, political retribution, and partisan politics or shall it be decided strictly on its merits as a national issue?

To this question there can be but one answer. Our duty to the people demands that we settle it squarely on its merits, leaving the question of political retribution to be settled elsewhere by appropriate methods. The one and only question before the House is this: What are the merits of this case?

To determine that question a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs was designated and made a complete personal inspection of projects, including Camp Benning, where the major portion of one day was spent going over the site and examining the buildings erected upon it or in course of construction. The committee was accompanied by a number of Army officers, whose relations to the committee were as nearly those of brother members thereof as it was possible to make them. The outstanding characteristic of this meeting was candor, first, last, and always. The cards were all upon the table, faces up, and these officers not only willingly but eagerly placed before the committee every bit of information it sought, with a completeness of detail, and left nothing to be desired.

Upon completion of this inspection, and after mature thought upon this project, the members of this subcommittee are, I believe, a unit in the opinion that on its merits as a training project the Camp Benning project can not be rejected. Of all the projects contemplated for the Army in this bill before Congress, the Camp Benning project is by far the most important, the most necessary, the most vital to the people whom we represent. Why? Because it is a project for the training of infantry officers and noncommissioned officers of the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Reserve Corps, and by such training to produce leaders of infantry units who will insure victory for America on the field of battle without sacrificial losses in human lives.

And how does this affect you and me, and the fathers and mothers of the communities from which we came?

Vitally and to this startling extent. Of all the dead who fell on the battle fields of France, and won for America a place in the esteem of the world never held before in the history of our great Nation, 89 per cent were infantrymen, while the remaining 11 per cent may be distributed among the other 11 branches of the service. The gross losses of the Infantry were eighteen and eight-tenths times those of the Field Artillery, twenty-seven and eight-tenths times as great as those of the Engineers, and thirty-four and seven-tenths times as great as those of all other arms combined.

Translated into language common to you and to me, the story of losses in the American Expeditionary Forces carries this message to the people: Of every 100 men called to the colors, 66 must be trained for and serve in the Infantry, and of every 100 infantrymen so serving in battle for a period equal to that covered by the operations of the American Expeditionary Forces and against an enemy equal in efficiency to the German soldier, 31 will be killed or wounded, unless by adequate training we secure victory on the field of battle at a less cost in human lives.

The Camp Benning project provides this training for the officers and noncommissioned officers of two-thirds of the entire Military Establishment, while 11 other projects are provided by this and by the predecessors of this Congress, with but slight question as to the advisability of expenditures involved. Yet, because this project for the Infantry, the very backbone of the Army—the arm on which victory or defeat inevitably depends—because this project has been badly handled by a temporary civilian official, we are actually confronted with a proposal to salvage it in order to punish him. Yet he escapes all the penalties involved while we visit the punishment on the people whom we represent, on the present and future infantrymen, who, like their predecessors, must bear the brunt of every battle and wring victory from the enemy by their very life's blood.

The 4,000,000 men, 77 per cent of whom were drafted for this war from our very ranks, and the 2,000,000 who served in France, but more especially that great army of infantrymen who in the gray dawn of a September morn went over the top in the Argonne Forest to meet in mortal combat the arch enemy of the civilized world—these men know the merits of this case and they and their posterity surely have a right to demand that this question be decided with impartial justice.

There can be no justice in a decision, no matter by what sophistry or political expediency supported, which denies to two-thirds of the Army the chance to train in the arts of leadership which save human lives and confers 11 training projects on the remaining third of the Army. There might be forced into this the external appearance of justice, but not the substance thereof if victory on the field of battle depends upon any 1 of the 11 arms which cooperate with Infantry on the field of battle; but such is not the case. That day on which the knight in armor had his helmet drilled through and his skull crushed by a rifle ball speeding through a distance which placed the rifleman beyond the reach of the horseman's lance—that day ushered in the supremacy of the rifle, and every new development in modern science has fortified its supremacy until to-day the tactics of Infantry may be accurately defined as the art of taking and holding ground, the tactics of any other arm the art of supporting Infantry. The proposal to take from the Infantry the single project by which it can teach under modern conditions the art of taking and holding in cooperation with its supporting arms must be rejected as a piece of folly of which this Congress should not be found guilty, no matter what just grievance may be entertained against the officials who were charged with its management. We are dealing not in the satisfaction of personal spite but in the lives of human beings—the lives of our children and our children's children, for the wars of the future as well as those of the recent past will call for the deployment of the full man power of the Nation.

It may be asked, Why this particular site? Why not Fort Sill or a dozen others that may be mentioned? The time of the House can not be taken up in a detailed discussion of each of these projects. There have been distributed through the House a number of pamphlets covering this very subject, and each Member can satisfy himself as to the particular project he had in mind. Suffice it to say that the subcommittee has actually inspected the majority of the projects that could possibly be considered in this connection and can assure the House that none can be accepted; that, in the language of Gen. Bullard, "I doubt that another piece of ground equal to Camp Benning for the location of an Infantry School of Arms could be found within the limits of the United States," and to repeat the substance of his testimony before the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, "If you take the Infantry school away from Camp Benning, you might as well have no Infantry school at all."

This is the testimony of one of the most candid and convincing characters it has ever been the pleasure of the committee to meet; the testimony of a man who had nothing to do with the selection of the site; the testimony of an Infantry expert who rose in succession through the various grades to that of lieutenant general and commander of the Second American Army in France; the testimony of a man whose period of active service is drawing to a close, and who speaks not in the interest of the passing moment but for those who are to take up the burden and carry it when he shall have given over the reins to those who are to follow in his illustrious footsteps. To his testimony is added that of Lieut. Gen. Hunter Liggett, the distinguished commander of the First American Army. His testimony is given not, like Gen. Bullard's, as a result of his personal inspection, but as a set of specifications for an Infantry school to meet the requirements of modern training. Camp Benning meets requirements, and no other project in America does. Both from practical and the academic point of view the project is thus vindicated by two of our most distinguished officers in the American service.

Among the most practical features which confront Congress to-day is one of finance. In this connection we must concern ourselves with the facts and disassociate ourselves from passion and prejudice. The facts before the House establish that $6,890,000 have actually been expended and that $2,329,000 is now asked to complete the project. From this amount we can deduct $515,252 and not purchase certain high-priced land, which it is not really necessary to acquire, and we can reduce the amount further by completing only such buildings as are necessary for the school at this time. An appropriation now of $765,252 would meet present purposes. And let me say that this money has already been appropriated, but is simply tied up by reason of reservations placed in the last Army appropriation bill.

A project so near completion as this can not be abandoned without tremendous financial loss. In view of its absolute necessity to the Infantry arm, both now and in the future, no matter what the size of the Army may be, this loss can not be justified before the people of the United States on the ground that it was incurred to avenge the wounded sensibilities of the Members of Congress. If we abandon this project, we write off the books a dead loss of about $5,000,000 and leave two-thirds of the Army without a training school, while giving to the remaining one-third 11 training projects. Disregarding the unspeakable injustice of such a course, the unwisdom and unsoundness of it from a financial and economical point of view, common sense demands the rejection of any proposition to abandon the plan or the curtailment of the plan to meet at once the requirements for training under the national-defense act. Moreover, the Secretary of War has called attention to the fact that heavy loss is being incurred through the deterioration of uncompleted buildings and materials now upon the ground, especially emphasizing the fact that this deterioration and consequent financial loss will be especially great during the winter months now approaching. The National Guard is urging the preparation of courses for its infantry personnel which the War Department can not guarantee until we act. This course has already been arranged and quite a number of National Guard officers have already been ordered to Camp Benning, notwithstanding the unfinished condition of the buildings there, and every day of delay adds to the embarrassment of the Infantry and the financial loss which the Government incurs.

In addition the people whose property has been taken and whose accounts have not been settled have a claim upon us for immediate action which we can not ignore. No matter how the situation may have changed since the date on which the War Department took over this project, a war measure, it is not fair to the property owners to delay for a week further a decision upon their cases. The winter, with its decisions with regard to coming crops, fuel, and the other complexities of life, is now almost upon them and we must hearken to their demand to settle and settle at once.

Maj. Gen. Farnsworth, one of the most careful, conscientious officers of the Army, is now in command at this camp, and among the difficulties which confront Gen. Farnsworth, because of the restriction upon expenditures for construction and the acquisition of land, may be mentioned the following:

(a) The garrison at Camp Benning numbers 301 officers and 1,472 enlisted men. Although the winter is approaching practically none of the buildings have the heating facilities completely installed. This applies also to the infirmary. The degree of completion in some cases is 98 per cent, but to complete the connections a small expenditure of money is necessary. This expenditure can not be made. If another month is allowed to pass without authority to proceed Gen. Farnsworth will be compelled to move the troops into tent camps and erect Sibley stoves in order to provide the necessary heat.

(b) The sewage system is complete except as to a few minor details which prevent its use at certain places, resulting in much inconvenience which could be avoided by the expenditure of a small sum.

(c) The bakery now established is so small that three shifts are necessary to produce the proper quantity of bread. The material is on hand to erect a bakery of the proper size for the needs of the garrison, merely by sending to Camp Benning the necessary trained personnel. A small expenditure is connected therewith, but neither the personnel can be sent nor the expenditure made until authority is secured for going ahead with the project.

I strongly favor the retention of this one of the most important projects that have been placed before the House in many years, and unless Members of this House are ready to go on record as placing petty spite above the lives of men, this project must meet with our approval.

I have here also the unqualified approval of Gen. Pershing in a letter to the Senate Military Committee, in which he goes into this project in detail and urges the completion and retention of this camp. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What is the legislative status of this matter? Has any bill or resolution been reported?

Mr. CRAGO. A bill will be reported and will be considered in the House within the next few days.

Mr. CONNALLY. It is not on the committee's calendar.

Mr. CRAGO. No.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this bill and the other bills from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on this bill and on other bills reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL rose.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, under the rule of recognition I think time should be extended now to some Member who is opposed to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] opposed to the bill?

Mr. CALDWELL. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any member of the committee opposed to the bill?

Mr. CALDWELL. But I am a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule provides that the time shall be equally divided between those in favor and those opposed to the bill. Is any member of the committee opposed to the bill demanding recognition? If not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to obtain recognition as against the gentleman from New York. I am opposed to the bill as it stands, but if the gentleman from New York is recognized, may I have a few minutes' time?

Mr. CALDWELL. Oh, yes; the gentleman may have as much of the hour except 20 minutes as he desires.

Mr. LITTLE. I will ask the gentleman to let me have 10 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois want? Fifteen minutes?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not want that much time.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then I yield so much of 15 minutes as the gentleman desires.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have the very highest opinion of the officers of the Regular Army. I think they are a wonderful set of men. I have a great deal of confidence in them both in respect to military matters and in regard to the ordinary transactions of life. No one, however, during my experience has ever undertaken to take away from the Army or the Navy anything to their advantage which they were receiving. The war-risk insurance act covered the officers and men of the Regular Army. Before that act was passed it was the law that when an Army officer died his family received a gratuity of six months' pay. We do the same thing with an employee of the House. Where an employee dies the Committee on Accounts brings in a resolution giving to the family of the deceased a sum equal to six months of his pay. There are many reasons why such practice is legitimate, and probably it is wise to have that sort of thing the permanent policy of the Government. Most of the Army officers are not disposed to save a great deal. The Army officer knows that as long as he is in the service he receives his pay, and if he reaches the age of retirement his pay continues, and if he dies, well there you take the chance. The Government, therefore, has provided in the past that it will pay to the widow or children of the deceased Army officer a sum equal to six months of his pay, so that they will have some cash in hand at least.

Now, the war-risk insurance act was intended to take the place of all other gratuities paid by the Government to Army officers in the Regular Establishment or in the Volunteer Establishment and all enlisted men both in the Army and in the Navy. Here was a new principle that came up. Instead of giving gratuities in other ways, as pensions according to the law theretofore, there was a new provision provided of giving gratuities by the Government in the way of compensation or whatever you may call it. Army officers were given the benefit of this, both in the Regular Establishment and in the National Army itself, both officers and enlisted men, and they went through the war without making a single objection, as far as I have been able to learn, that they were not well cared for under the war-risk act. But after the war is over the families of those who had died received the benefit of the war-risk insurance act, both officers and men, and after they have received the benefit which Congress concluded the Government should give them some bright officer remembers that they used to get a gratuity of six months' pay. Therefore this bill is sent by the War Department to Congress suggesting that that six months' pay or gratuity be restored, it having been repealed by accident, or incident, or ignorance, or whatever it was.

It is just the case of where if a man has enjoyed a particular thing and you give him something which is better, he wants both. These Army officers have enjoyed the benefit of the war-risk insurance act and now want the benefit of the old custom of the Government giving their families a gratuity. There is no reason in the world why so far as the war deaths are concerned there should be any distinction between the Regular Army and the National Army, or whatever it is called. [Applause.] And there is no reason for giving any of them this gratuity now, because they are taken care of by the war-risk insurance act. [Applause.] And if the Congress should undertake to give them all a bonus of some kind they all ought to get the benefit of it on equal terms. [Applause.] Now, the first two sections of this bill, drafted by the War Department, were sent to Congress to be enacted into law. The Senate could not see the justice of giving these officers who have died in the service the benefit of the war-risk insurance act, and then, in addition, an entire gratuity, and inserted an amendment in the bill, which is section 3 of the bill, providing that if the war-risk insurance was paid at least the six months' gratuity to be paid should be deducted from that. Well, as to the past, nobody could object to that. As to the future, it may be that it would not work very well. The Army says it draws a distinction between those who take insurance and those who do not and it is a penalty on those who do take insurance. Now, the committee recommends striking out the provision inserted by the Senate to deduct the amount of the six months' gratuity from the war-risk compensation paid, and then provides in addition that we go back to October 6, 1917. I think this House is disposed to do one thing which will improve this bill decidedly. Section 1 of the bill reads that hereafter, and so forth, this gratuity shall be granted; that is in line 3. In line 7 they put in, "from and after October 6, 1917." The House committee have proposed two amendments to rearrange the phraseology, and if this committee will just disagree to the first amendment—the first amendment proposes to strike out the word "hereafter" and insert the words "from and after October 6, 1917"—if this committee will just disagree to that amendment and leave the bill to read, "that hereafter," and then will agree to the amendment suggested by the committee in line 7, to strike out "from and after October 6, 1917," it will restore the law to what it was before the war, with the one exception that the officer in the Regular Establishment hereafter may take insurance under the war-risk insurance act, and if he does he receives compensation in that way and also will get the benefit of the six months' gratuity.

Mr. ROWE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will.

Mr. ROWE. In the war-risk insurance act the soldier pays a premium. What proportion of the actual cost of carrying that insurance is the premium?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not quite understand the question.

Mr. ROWE. How much does the Government pay in proportion to what the soldier pays to carry the insurance?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, nobody knows and nobody ever will know in our lifetime how much it is going to cost the Government to pay the insurance that is being carried by the Government. The actuaries may guess at it, but nobody knows.

Mr. ROWE. Was not the estimate something like 7 to 1?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I could not state; I do not know.

Mr. ROWE. Seven to the Government and one to the soldier?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know what the estimate was. I am perfectly frank to say I am not very familiar with the war-risk insurance act. I was not here when it was passed. Whatever the estimate is, no one knows, because no such insurance was ever carried before by any establishment in the world.

Mr. SNYDER. But it is a fact, is it not, that the officer who took out insurance under the war-risk insurance act believed that he was paying a reasonable premium on his policy?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know what he believes, I am sure.

Mr. ROWE. That is the fact.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think probably he believes he is paying an unreasonably low premium on his policy.

Mr. SNYDER. Well, he is paying something, and he is entitled to consideration for that at least.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. The testimony before the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce developed the fact that the cost of insurance under the war-risk provision is about 20 per cent less than any insurance company of the old-line style.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Very likely that is the case.

Mr. SNYDER. I believe that——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The cost is less and the risk is more. No old-line insurance company in the world could ever have afforded to insure as many people as were insured by the Government of the United States under the war-risk act. And no one can tell what it may cost the Government in the end. Everyone who takes the insurance knows that under no conditions will the payment of the insurance when earned be repudiated by the Government of the United States, no matter how much it takes out of the Treasury.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield back the time that he has not used?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, yes; I yield it back.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I was glad to hear the statement by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a minute ago, that in so far as war casualties were concerned all of the soldiers, whether in the Regular Army or in the National Guard or in the Army enlisted from the drafted men, should be put on an equality. That is a principle which we certainly should endeavor to keep in view. In dealing with the enlisted men, in dealing with the rank and file, and in dealing with the officers, they should all be put on an equality; that is, the enlisted men, no matter whence they came, should have the same consideration, and the officers of the National Guard and National Army should have the same consideration as those of the Regular Army. And this measure deals to a certain extent with that question.

And I want to talk for a few minutes about the officers who were not members of the Regular Army. Those officers are not getting the same consideration as the officers of the Regular Army. I have to-day a communication from a young man in my State who received before the war about $2,500 a year from the business in which he was engaged. He entered the officers' training camp and established a record which entitled him to be a first lieutenant. In the breaking of the Hindenburg line he lost his right arm. He is incapacitated for the work which he did before he entered the Army. He was first certified at 50 per cent disabled and accorded $15 a month. Subsequently a certification was considered, and he was put on at complete disability and certified for $30 a month. In the same division a companion of his in the Regular Army, a first lieutenant, was wounded less severely, and is retired at $157 a month. Now, that is merely because one was in the Regular Army and the other was not. I saw at the Walter Reed Hospital last summer a lieutenant colonel of the National Guard who had lost his right foot. The amputation was just above the knee. He was then certified at 50 per cent disability and entitled to $15 a month. A lieutenant colonel in the Regular Army with the same disability is retired at around $325 a month.

Now, there has been legislation proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] to put all on an equality as to retirement. I have introduced a bill, which has been before the Committee on Military Affairs for months, providing that those officers who suffered disabilities in the National Army, regardless of whether in the Regular Army or National Guard or National Army during the war with Germany, should have the same right of retirement as the officers in the Regular Army. For reasons sufficient to themselves—and I admit that there are some good reasons for it——

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will.

Mr. CRAGO. Does the gentleman know whether this has been provided for the volunteer officers of any other war?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will come to that in one minute. For reasons which are sufficient to them, and which appear to them to be good reasons, I will admit, the Military Affairs Committee, on the recommendation of the War Department and the General Staff, have refused to report any of those measures.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman please state the reasons of the War Department why the Regular officers should enjoy this advantage over the others?

Mr. STEVENSON. The reason that the War Department assigns, and the reason, I understand, that the Committee on Military Affairs assigns, is—

That it is the custom to retain the retired list absolutely and exclusively for the officers of the Regular Army, and that it is a custom that has prevailed from the beginning of the Government or the establishment of the retired list; that the officers of the Civil War outside of the Regular Army were never accorded the right, and therefore it is improper, and that in addition to that the men when they enlist in the Regular Army part with all of their opportunities to make a living in any other way, and that their entire expectation is based upon the proper retirement provisions made for them, and it should be exclusively kept for them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the statements the gentleman has just made are the reasons that are governing the withholding of the recommendation of his bill, he has been somewhat misinformed as to the details of it. There has been no retired list since the beginning of the Government, and the reason which he assigns as to the customs of the service are not the actuating reasons at all. It is an entirely distinct proposition, on which the gentleman ought to get further light before he unintentionally distorts the reasons on which it is based.

Mr. CRAGO. With all due deference to the opinion of my colleague, I think the gentleman was stating a part of the argument for keeping this list for the Regular Army. But is not this the regular reason, that the retirement list is a part of the pay and allowances provided by law for the Regular Army?

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the argument, as I understand it, and notwithstanding the position of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated the exact position I have heard taken in the discussion of the matter.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What has ever become of your bill?

Mr. STEVENSON. It is in the Committee on Military Affairs, with a motion noted to ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why do they not report it here? There is absolute justice in it. Why do they not report it one way or the other, so that we can get a crack at it?

Mr. STEVENSON. I have stated the reasons, so far as I have been able to ascertain them, why it was not reported.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I would like to suggest, notwithstanding the very helpful suggestion of my committee colleague, that the foundation of the condition is that the retired list of the Army is still a part of the professional Military Establishment which is liable to a call to duty. That is the fact.

Mr. STEVENSON. And with the uprising on the border of Mexico the same men who were called to duty there as National Guardsmen were not discriminated between when they were called to go against the Hindenburg line, and seven officers of one company of the National Guard from my district went down in one hour, and none of them is allowed on the retired list, although some of them survived as shattered wrecks. I say that all are called upon to respond. No discrimination is made in the service, but now when they exhibit their wounds and ask to be equally treated with the Regular Army officers in like condition their just request is smothered in committee.

And when we call again, with this discriminating system and with this determination to perpetuate this discriminating system against them, we may call in vain for the splendid officers who led their men, and many of whom left parts of their bodies on the battle fields across the water.

Now, it is not such an impossible thing to take care of these men. I have from the War Department a report showing that there are not over 11,000 officers that are disabled that are outside of the Regular Army. We can not afford—this Congress can not afford and the country can not afford—to continue the apparent injustice, which is bringing editorials to me from papers all over the United States, which is bringing protests from people from every district in the United States, urging me to take some steps to push the measure which I have introduced and which has been favored very largely by the members of the Legion that do not belong to the Regular Army.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Has the gentleman found any opposition on the part of Members of Congress to his bill excepting members of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir; I have not.

Now, sir, I want to say this: We will meet the arguments of the gentlemen who say that this retired list is a part of the pay of the officers of the Regular Army. They are perfectly willing, so far as I have conversed with them, to concede that the same compensation should be made to officers as is made to officers on the retired list, those who have been disabled in the Army, but they say that the retired list is like the Ark of God in the wilderness, and that a man putting his hand on it should die right there. That is about the attitude.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. STEVENSON. I beg to be excused just now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. In order to meet that situation I have to-day introduced a bill to provide that the disability compensation of officers who were in the conflict and who became disabled by reason of wounds suffered in the conflict, and who were not in the Regular Army, shall be increased to the same amount as is paid to like officers who are retired in the Army. Now, I want to see whether that will ever get out of the committee. It has gone to the Committee on Military Affairs, and certainly this Congress does not propose to go on record as opposing this matter of justice as between officers of the Regular Army and officers of the Volunteer Army, which suffered probably more casualties but perhaps not so large a per cent.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the gentleman is now stating the real basis upon which the Members of the House might very readily get together and pass a bill covering this situation. The committee did not oppose the bill because it was unwilling to give a fair compensation to these men who undoubtedly lost their lives on a parity with the men of the Regular Establishment, but because as a matter of law the Regular Army officer on the retired list is always subject to the call of duty, and so remains to the day of his death as a part of the Regular Establishment. If you can provide a means of compensation and not provide for his incorporation in this permanent organization, you would probably get a favorable hearing.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am glad to say that I expect to have a hearing from the committee on the bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Of course I believe the gentleman from South Carolina wants to do what is just and right, and I think the gentleman has gotten on the right line in accordance with the statement of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE]. But I want to know if the gentleman is willing to go along and allow the same compensation to the private as he would to an officer, if he bases it upon compensation for a like disability?

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the difficulty with the course I have taken with this bill. I am in favor of maintaining the same ratio between the officers and the men which Congress fixed when it provided for the Army. It made the distinction as to pay. It certainly based it upon some reason. The reason is well known, that these men come from a walk of life where they have to surrender much more than the average private; and while I would not discriminate against a private at all, certainly it is not discriminating against a private to require, when the Government pays one set of officers as a retirement feature on a certain disability, that it pay all the officers a certain amount. The only discrimination is that which is now prevailing.

The privates in the Regular Army and in the National Guard and National Army are on absolute equality. It is only in the case of officers that there is a discrimination.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by printing an editorial on this subject from the Piedmont, of Greenville, S. C., situated where one of these hospitals is, containing a list of disabilities which it discusses.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting the editorial referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the editorial referred to:

INFAMOUS DISCRIMINATION.

From time to time the Piedmont has commented on the indefensible and outrageous discrimination made by the Government against disabled National Guard, Reserve, National Army, and temporary officers. They are not given the same treatment as disabled Regular Army officers.

The Regular Army officer is retired on three-fourths pay because he has lost his means of livelihood.

Why shouldn't any officer be retired who has lost his means of livelihood?

Why should disabled National Guard, Reserve, National Army, and temporary officers be given a pittance instead of three-fourths pay like the Regular Army officers?

All officers were on the same footing during the war as to work, duties, responsibilities, dangers, and risks. All were subject to the same rules and regulations; subject to the same orders; there was no discrimination among officers in going into action; gas, shrapnel, bayonet, bombs, and disease found all alike. They suffered the same hardships, incurred similar wounds, were disabled by the same disease. During the war there was no discrimination as to officers, all were simply American Army officers.

Does this discrimination work actual injustice and hardship? Consider a few instances in contrast and then judge for yourself. These instances are selected at random from actual cases at one of the Government tuberculosis hospitals and are embodied in a memorandum sent to the Piedmont by Clifton E. Gurd, of Asheville. They are as follows:

CAPT. A.

Age 57; six children; contracting engineer; commissioned temporary captain from civil life and assigned to work on the General Staff. Close, confining work caused breakdown, followed by flu. Developed pulmonary tuberculosis. Prohibited from reassuming professional work. Too late in life to start over. Means of making livelihood destroyed. Not eligible for retirement.

LIEUT. B.

Age 23; married; one child; in school at outbreak of war; commissioned lieutenant provisional. Attack of flu followed by pulmonary tuberculosis. Unable to assume work of hard or confining nature. He has been retired on three-fourths pay.

LIEUT. COL. C.

Age 47; married; two children; National Guard officer; 28 years of service in Guards. Spanish-American War veteran. Served in Army of Cuban occupation. Served on border. Served throughout World War. Participated in all Army maneuvers in past. A most strenuous career. Leather manufacturer in civil life. Pulmonary tuberculosis. Impossible to return to work. Too late in life to start in new line. Not eligible for retirement.

CAPT. D.

Age 26; single; just out of West Point at beginning of war. No overseas service. Regular Army. Tuberculosis. Will be retired on three-fourths pay.

LIEUT. E.

Age 42; married; several children; 16 years' service. Campaign Philippines, China, and many other places. In ranks Regular Army. Commissioned temporary officer beginning of war. Most valuable service in organization and equipment port of embarkation. Pulmonary tuberculosis. Can not return to Army life. Has no other means of livelihood. Not eligible to retirement.

CAPT. X.

Age 35; single; Regular Army; tuberculosis. Has been retired on three-fourths pay.

LIEUT. F.

Age 40. Married. Six children. Twenty years' service in ranks Regular Army. Many campaigns. Commissioned temporary officer. Overseas service. Tuberculosis. Can not return to Army life. No other means of livelihood. Not eligible for retirement.

LIEUT. COL. G.

Age about 45. Married. One child. Eighteen years' service in Regular Army, part in ranks. Not overseas. Regular Army officer. Never commanded troops, had staff assignment. Tuberculosis. Retired on three-fourths pay.

CAPT. H.

Age 36. Married. One child. Concrete engineer 14 years. Commissioned from civil life. National Army officer, in Infantry. Had influenza and developed into pulmonary tuberculosis. Absolutely prohibited from returning to profession. Incapacitated from hard work. No independent income. Not eligible for retirement.

CAPT. I.

Age 28. Single. Just out of West Point before war. Not overseas. Will be retired on three-fourths pay.

Thousands of like cases could be cited. These are just a few gathered at one hospital. They can be duplicated over and over again in any Government hospital. As Mr. Gurd says, "Men suffering from identical wounds, often from the same commands, and wounded in the same action, can be found in most any hospital. And yet there is the greatest discrimination in the provisions for their future welfare." The Regular Army officer is eligible for retirement. Any other sort of officer must depend upon his own resources—or those of his relatives.

Is this consistent with the American sense of fair play?

Is this a square deal for the officer outside of the Regular Army who is practically helpless because he served his country in the hour of his country's greatest peril?

What sort of democracy is ours, if it places a higher valuation on one sort of officer than on another sort when both have rendered the same service?

Be it said to the credit of South Carolina that Representative W. F. STEVENSON has a bill pending to abolish this intolerable discrimination. It should be passed without delay.

AN INTOLERABLE OUTRAGE.

Disabled officers of the Regular Army are retired on three-fourths of the pay they received before becoming disabled.

The National Guard, National Army, and temporary officers of the Army are left out in the cold.

Disabled officers of the United States Army ought to be retired on the same basis, no matter to what branch of the Army they belonged.

A bill is pending in the Congress to put all on the same basis for retirement.

For some strange reason, which has never been disclosed, a vigorous fight has been waged in the Congress against extending the retirement privilege and benefits to all officers. The source of this antagonism has not been revealed.

The strongest point of the opponents of the bill is this:

When a man enters the Regular Army he is presumed to have severed all connection with civil and industrial life. Therefore he has cut himself off from all sources of income and means of making a livelihood excepting the Army, and consequently the Nation should care for him when he is disabled.

That is right, as far as it goes.

The opponents of the bill go on to advance the theory that officers, except those in the Regular Army, coming into the service from civil life have but temporarily severed their connection with civil and industrial life.

In theory this is correct, but when the officer from civil life entered the service in the World War, he did it with the knowledge that he was headed for battle, and that it was doubtful whether he would return at all. He severed himself not only from his civil pursuits but mentally he severed himself from life itself.

It is argued that the Regular Army officer is retired because he has lost his means of livelihood.

Any officer should be retired who has lost his means of livelihood, no matter whether he belongs to the Regular Army, National Guard, or National Army.

Inasmuch as any National Guard, Reserve, National Army, or Emergency officer, by reason of disability, is unable to return to his means of livelihood in civil life just as the Regular Army officer is unable to return to his means of livelihood in the military service, they are on absolutely the same footing as to their future helplessness to support themselves and their families.

Retirement is the custom of the Army. It has long been adopted as the best method of providing for the future of the Nation's officers disabled in line of duty.

Retirement privileges should not be confined to Regular Army officers, but should be extended to all American Army officers.

Now that we have gone over the case, what is your belief?

Do present provisions appeal to you as being a square deal for the man who is practically helpless as a result of his services to his country in time of war?

Do you believe that the bills now before the Congress, which provide that all officers shall be on the same basis as to retirement should be passed?

Are you willing, as an American citizen, to lend your influence to secure the passage of these bills?

Then you are asked to act as your judgment advises you in throwing your support to influence the Congress to make these bills into laws.

It is imperative that you act at once, because this bill will be before the Congress in the next few weeks for final action.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, the closing statement of the gentleman from North Carolina rather disposes, perhaps——

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one minute?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] and the gentleman from Vermont both referred to me inadvertently as "the gentleman from North Carolina." I would like to get the RECORD correct. I represent a district in South Carolina, although I am a native of North Carolina.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I always get mixed up about the points of the compass when I find myself between two suns. [Laughter.] The statement of the gentleman from South Carolina rather disposes of the necessity of my making a statement to clear up the policy of the committee, if I may be allowed to represent it in part to that extent, in regard to establishing a retired list for the volunteer or emergency soldiers on the same basis and in the same organization as the professional soldiers. As has been the policy for a great many years, the retirement of the professional soldier is based upon an entirely different philosophy, as any Member may determine if he carefully inquires into the situation. It is based upon the same idea as occupational or professional retirement anywhere. It is based upon the idea that a man goes into this peculiar profession—and it is a peculiar one, inasmuch as it isolates a man from other professions in civil life—that a man goes into that profession to serve for a lifetime, having sworn to serve at certain fixed statutory rates of pay; that he will be under obligation to engage in no other gainful occupation; that he will be a man subject to military orders night and day under all circumstances and at all times; that he will have no fixed home or abiding place; that he will live in garrisons or in the field, and take care of his family as best he can under those circumstances; and that he can only gain successive raises in his salary as he advances along a tortuous and sometimes seemingly never-ending lineal list, where seniority constantly blocks him off.

Having all these things in consideration, it long ago grew up to be the policy of the law that the officers of the permanent Military Establishment undertaking these obligations should be carried through with these statutory rates of pay until they attained the age of 62 or 64 years, when they would be retired on three-quarters pay. That has become now, through more than a generation, to be considered a part of the contract of service.

But it also carries with it a further obligation on the part of the officer so retired that he is still a part of the regular permanent Military Establishment, that circumstances and the nature of his disability permitting he may be called at any time to serve his country in a military capacity to the extent of his abilities, and he is always a professional soldier from the day he enters the service until the day that he dies. There is no end to it except by his voluntary resignation, when, of course, he relinquishes all the benefits of his retirement.

Mr. CALDWELL. And subject to the Articles of War?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And subject to the Articles of War.

Now, that is the officer's side of it.

On the other hand, the law contemplates something of the same philosophy for the enlisted man, and it provides that the enlisted man, having served faithfully and well, or, as the language of the service is, "his service being honest and faithful," at the end of 30 years he, too, can be retired. That provides a very excellent opportunity for many enlisted men who have followed professional Army life from the time they were 18 to the time they were 48—and you will find them scattered all through the country—to enter upon civilian duties, many of them drawing as much as $75 a month from the Government in addition to the pay which they can get in civil life.

Now, my story is somewhat long, and perhaps I have dwelt upon it at too great length, and there are many and various phases that I have not even dwelt upon at that. But I want to impress upon you the distinction between the existing law and what is being asked for in these propositions for the retirement of the temporary officer.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am sorry, but my limited time will not allow me to do so.

The volunteer soldier should be entitled to equivalent recognition of his disabilities, but in order to do this he should not be put into the professional organization where he was not when he went into the war, and where he may not, of his own volition, care to stay.

You are confusing the means of compensation with the proper principle of compensation.

I think it would be a great mistake to begin to clutter up—literally clutter up—the permanent Military Establishment by the addition of the temporary soldier, noble and brave as he is, by putting him in a place where he did not design originally to go, and where he does not care to stay, and where, if you do place him, he will block the orderly administration of a distinctly professional army which has no other gainful occupation. I think we should take these things carefully into consideration when we think of the so-called retirement laws for the volunteer soldier.

I know they cite instances of the young men who have just become professional soldiers, just having gone into the Regular Establishment, and who were wounded at the same time as young emergency officers were wounded, the young officer in the Regular Establishment going on the retired list and receiving more money. But that is a mere incident that will be developed in any actuary's tables of any insurance or retirement provision; the junior men who are wounded and retired are exceptional; the rule is that a man goes along through the average period of service, sometimes ranging as long as 40 or 45 years. This retirement law operates in both time of peace and time of war; it is continuous.

So if we survey this matter in the logic of a business proposition and not simply in the light of our honest and very proper desire to reward the gallant disabled volunteer soldier, to whom we all desire to give grateful and substantial recognition, our thought will take expression along the line of a philosophy which is consistent with the practical application of the facts and not be lost in sentiment.

Mr. CALDWELL. I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I quite agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that either the committee amendment to this bill making it retroactive should be defeated or that it should be so amended as to extend to the reserve and National Guard officers and enlisted men who went into the service merely for the duration of the war, as well as to those in the Regular Establishment.

I do not believe that the antagonism which in some quarters has grown up or has been incited as between the Regular Army and the volunteers should be encouraged. Nevertheless, it is quite true that during the Great War a considerable sentiment grew up among the reserve and National Guard officers and the duration-of-the-war men that discriminations were made favorable to the officers and men of the Regular Army.

If you pass this bill with the retroactive clause, making it apply only to officers in the Regular Establishment during the period of the war and excluding from its operation those cases of reserve and National Guard officers and men, you will give emphasis to that antagonism and to that dissatisfaction among the reserve officers and men. So I intend to offer, when this bill is considered under the five-minute rule, the following amendment:

On page 1, line 6, after the word "Army," insert "or on active service in the military forces of the United States during the World War."

Gentlemen, you in your wisdom may decide that it is not wise to make this act retroactive. If the committee should decide that this law should be enacted containing the word "hereafter," all well and good; but if you are to make it retroactive, then I call the attention of the committee to the fact that it will be very unwise not to make its terms apply equally to the reserve officers and enlisted men as well as those in the Regular Establishment.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, many of the enlisted men and officers who went into the service, whether as volunteers or as drafted men, gave up much more when they left civilian pursuits than those who were in the Regular Establishment. Certainly those officers and enlisted men who gave their lives could give nothing more. If you are to extend this gratuity to the officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, let it not be said that this Congress discriminates against that great civilian Army of ours who in the hour of peril and emergency the Government called upon to fight its battles, and who fought them so valiantly, so gloriously, and so successfully.

In many ways, gentlemen of the House, this war was one unprecedented in the annals of American history. It was the first struggle of any magnitude in which our forces were required to fight on foreign soil. It entailed many hardships not entailed in previous struggles in which this country was engaged. It entailed long absence from home without opportunity for furlough or return to the home. It entailed on the part of many families of these soldiers the fact that their bodies were buried on foreign soil and still repose there. I suggest most earnestly to this committee that if you enact this bill with the retroactive feature in it, you make provision embracing every man, whether officer or enlisted man, whether Regular or drafted or National Guard.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Assuming that the gentleman's proposed amendment carries, would the gentleman be in favor of retaining section 3?

Mr. CONNALLY. My attention has not been especially directed to that. I have no decided conviction about that; it is immaterial. But if my amendment is adopted I shall later offer an amendment to strike out section 2, because otherwise the provisions of section 2 would nullify the terms of my amendment.

It is assumed that every man when he donned the uniform of the Army went wherever those in authority sent him, whether on the firing line or to some staff position whose importance was often great and which involved the necessary duty of feeding and clothing and serving the Army in the field. I trust that agitation seeking to raise discrimination and distinctions between the Regulars and the Volunteers will cease. But it will not cease if in our legislation we discriminate either in favor of one or in favor of the other.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak not upon the measure now pending but on a matter somewhat germane, because it relates to the soldiers. The matter concerning which I wish to address you relates to the bringing home from France of the bodies of soldiers who lost their lives in that country in the late war, who went there from America, and I ask the Clerk to read in my time a newspaper clipping purporting to be sent out by the Associated Press.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

AMERICAN DEAD TO REMAIN IN FRANCE—MUST BE LEFT IN GRAVES AT LEAST TWO MORE YEARS, SAYS CABLE.

[By the Associated Press.]

PARIS, November 25.

The 65,000 American dead in France must be left in the graves they now occupy until the French are ready to exhume their own dead, which, it is hoped, will be before January 1, 1922.

The foreign office had promised to consider the latest request of the American Government for the return of its fallen soldiers, but later the following official announcement was made:

"It has been definitely decided that the Allies who fell together for the same cause should remain together in death until circumstances permit of the returning of the bodies to the families for whom they sacrificed themselves.

"The proposed law forbidding the exhumation of the soldier dead for three years did not pass at the last session of the Chamber of Deputies, but the foreign office expects that it will be adopted soon. This bill specifies a delay in exhumation of three years from the promulgation of the law, but it is expected that this period will be shortened. At the foreign office it is said to be probable that the exhumation will commence considerably before January, 1922."

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Simply for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Rather than being based upon any sentimental, patriotic reason, is it not a fact that the sole objection that France has now to our soldiers being brought back to this country is a commercial one?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Gentlemen may draw their own conclusion.

Mr. BLANTON. It is the only reasonable excuse that France could give.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. We should like to know by what authority the French Government undertakes to dictate to us as to when and under what circumstances we may transfer to native or adopted land the bodies of American heroes who now repose in French soil soldiers who fell in the defense of the liberties of the peoples of France and of the other nations of the earth. We should like to know if the French Chamber of Deputies is vested with the power to enact a law prohibiting the disinterment and removal home of bodies of American soldiers now resting in American cemeteries established at Romaigne and elsewhere in that country. We should like to know the nature of the tenure of our Government to the lands where these soldiers lie buried.

What is our title to that land? What estate therein do we hold? How was it acquired? Were the original freeholders disseized and have they been paid for the land? Is our title to these burial grounds in fee simple and indefeasible? To what extent are American interests in these lands, now dedicated to the American dead, safeguarded by law?

Mr. CALDWELL. Does the gentleman want an answer to that? I can answer the gentleman by saying that the property used in American graveyards is the property of the American Government, dedicated for all time to the American service.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I am glad to hear that.

It may be true that the War Department has acted with all possible care and prudence by taking every step necessary to be taken in order to extend our jurisdiction over these grounds. But of this I am not certain, else why should the legislative department of the French Government propose a law forbidding the exhumation of the bodies for three long years? What is the object of such legislation? Answer the question for yourself.

Only the relatives of a small per cent of the number of American soldiers who fell in France are financially able to defray the expense of a journey to that country in order to visit the resting place of the soldiers. The great majority of our soldiers were not of the wealthy or even the well-to-do families, although these families contributed their full quota; but the great majority of the soldiers included in the army of occupation came from families of very moderate circumstance. Therefore, as a general proposition, the kinsmen and friends of the soldiers who died in France can not visit the graves of the soldiers, because they are so far away.

The very least the relatives and friends of these dead soldiers have the right to expect—to demand, I will say—is the prompt return of their bodies to the old home, where they may be laid to rest in the cemetery or in the family graveyard alongside other loved ones gone before.

The order to go into the Army and over to France came from the Government. Love of country, which we call patriotism, was crystallized into the law which gave the command. That command was not to be disobeyed, for it was the expression of the national will, the voice of the Republic; but loyal and patriotic obedience in these cases led to death. The Government at its own expense and under compulsion of military necessity, having taken the soldier far from home and subjected him to service which cost him his life, upon request of the family, is honorably bound at its own expense promptly to return all that is mortal of the soldier to the tender care of the ones who loved him and who mourn for his tragic fate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I ask permission to speak for one additional minute, not to be taken out of the committee's time.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The committee can not do that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is fixed by the rules of the House.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks and subjoin to them a letter from a society styling itself "Bring Home Our Soldier Dead League" and papers in the nature of a petition annexed thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, who is that petition from?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Well——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Can not its identity be established?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. It is a letter to me inclosing a copy of a letter addressed to the Hon. Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, and the names of the officers of the organization are: J. D. Foster, H. F. Richards, J. B. McIntire, Mrs. George L. Walter, jr., F. K. Weaver, George Ranking, jr., Mrs. H. F. Richards, Theodore H. Boyce, George W. Cordes, and D. B. Maxwell, chairman.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman know any of those whose names he has read?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. No; I do not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does he know whether any are connected with undertaking establishments or not?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I have no information on the subject.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Until the gentleman has that information I shall object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, leaving out the papers referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Subsequently the objection was withdrawn, and the papers referred to are as follows:

BRING HOME THE SOLDIER DEAD LEAGUE,
Pittsburgh, Pa., November.

Subject: "Bring home our soldier dead."

Hon. WELLS GOODYKOONTZ,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The petition hereto attached from the Bring Home the Soldier Dead League, described therein in some detail, is, as you may observe, the same document sent to Mr. Lansing, Secretary of State, on October 31 ultimo.

Mr. Lansing very promptly replied, giving a full and clear statement of the present situation, and disclosing the position taken by France in the matter.

It is because of that attitude of France that this organization was formed to appeal to our own Government to take such drastic action as may be needed to have France accept the wishes and heart and principles of American motherhood in this matter rather than unjustly impose any national or individual thought of her own.

We ask that this petition will be considered and treated by you as the original, praying your heartiest aid.

Very respectfully, yours,

BRING HOME THE SOLDIER DEAD LEAGUE,
Chairman Executive Committee.

HEADQUARTERS BRING HOME THE SOLDIER DEAD LEAGUE,
Pittsburgh, Pa.

To the Hon. ROBERT E. LANSING,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The Bring Home the Soldier Dead League, an organization, with headquarters at the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., composed of parents, widows, and relatives of American hero dead, now occupying graves in France, far beyond the boundaries of their native land, where neither homage of their countrymen nor the devotion of loving hearts may offer the only acknowledgment of their supreme sacrifice, comes to you with authority, representing primarily the hundreds of active members, and behind them the thousands who are distributed over every State of the Union, as from day to day they may enroll, including the soldier organizations and sympathizing persons, and for each and all this petition is respectfully presented; necessarily it will embrace facts, argument, and sentiment. We trust as a whole it may prove convincing. If it were less the depth of convictions might not appear.

First. We do not come as suppliants, but as true American citizens with the vigor of conscious right, demanding that without hesitation or a moment's delay the Government shall carry out the imperative duty, and most solemn obligation to bring home our soldier dead. Time is the very soul of the matter; it is now.

Second. After one whole year of patient waiting, affording ample time for governmental action, and with full knowledge of the suggestions put forth by France for holding our sacred dead, we can not recognize either the force or justice or fairness of any feature of her attitude or actions, of actuating motive, and we here appeal to you for the solace which is our right; bring home our soldier dead now.

Third. Deploring the necessity which calls forth this action, and recognizing an obligation to state the reasons which actuate us hereto, and desiring they may be known of all men, respectfully represent:

Fourth. War, which presupposes enmity, is always most tragic; but in this great World War, after a period of two years' progress and at the hour when it embodied the most ferocious, and even diabolical atrocities ever practiced by man, our American boys went bravely into that awfulness carrying with them the hearts of the mothers whose one thought was safe return; that mother heart now lies buried in France, while with her the tragedy of suffering will abide over here long after the fight, made for principle and democracy by those boys over there is forgotten in its detail.

Fifth. Peaceful death at home, free from the turmoil of war, with the solace of a grave within easy reach, leaves no tragic memories, while the tragedy of war involves that quality of the mother heart which men fail to understand; the solace of the grave for our dead soldiers within easy reach is now demanded as the duty of the Government to save the parents and widows from needless heart sorrow and save undesirable national issues and questions from arising in these strenuous times.

Sixth. Early in 1917 many of our American boys were in France, and thousands more of them were in cantonments at home soon the question arose, "Will the bodies of the dead be brought home?" It was discussed everywhere and became so insistent that the Secretary of War took notice, and as a result doubts were banished and hearts satisfied and morale established upon your public announcement that positively the bodies would be brought home.

Seventh. That declaration at that time surely was a binding agreement (at least with those on this side) and one which this country dare not longer delay in carrying out. Such an agreement between individuals would surely be a binding obligation, and we as citizens protest that this Government shall not have a different standard of ethics and duty than the highest standard observed by individuals, i. e., to keep the faith, and we respectfully submit that such agreement with the Government is enforceable in the court of right and duty.

The promise to the soldier was also the solemn assurance to the mother that her boy would be brought home for proper burial, not at the end of the war but in the event of his death, and a reasonable time thereafter; not at the end of three years or any other delayed time, but now; and it is not a fitting explanation of delay to name a future time suitable only to the convenience or purposes or possible caprice of France or any other power.

That agreement with the soldier himself and the assurance to the public is, in a sense, an obligation on every citizen, and it is being acknowledged by general support of this demand for fulfillment now.

Eighth. At a time after the armistice was signed, when the Government and the parents were in accord in the matter and steps for the return had been taken and the Congress had most generously provided money for the work, it is said that France offered suggestions for delay, and as a result the auspicious start was halted.

a. That situation, viz, the action of the Congress in providing money, the fact that start was actually made, the fact that excuses had to be offered by France to secure delay, the enlisting Gen. Pershing while he was yet in France to favor the delay, and finally the Secretary of War adopting and giving out the very excuses advanced by France, all give conclusive construction and proof that the agreement and intention was that the bodies would be brought home within a reasonable time, and we submit that the reasonable time was when France gave out her excuses.

b. This country must not further violate that agreement by longer delay; must not accept the excuses or wishes of France as against the rights of the American mothers; must not ignore the sacred duty to act now; must not leave the widows and parents to longer grieve for this consoling possession, now lying neglected and for the time abandoned, after giving their all that others might be safe.

c. The sons of America now buried over there died to save France, the same France of which so very recently it was thought no harsh feelings could ever arise among American people.

Ninth. Two suggestions were made by France to justify the delay of three years:

a. Economic conditions.

b. Sanitary conditions.

The economic conditions were never apparent to Americans, whatever the term was intended to cover; but how can it be pretended that American mothers are interested in such matters, except, possibly shipping, and at this time there are abundant ships for the purpose.

The sanitary question seems idle indeed when we think of what was accomplished during the war, and reflect that no such question has force.

Whether one ship is required or one thousand; whether one body or fifty thousand can make no difference, the duty to bring home our soldier dead now is just the same.

Aside from all that, there is the one great question: Are the American people to be ignored by their Government at the suggestion of France, and for her convenience or purposes?

Tenth. America spent millions of dollars for labor in sending soldiers across and can spend millions more for the bringing home of the dead, and when we think of Chateau-Thierry, Belleau Woods, Fismette, the Vesle River, and the Argonne, and reflect that ear has been given to the more or less specious suggestions of France, we resolve to double our efforts in all directions behind this appeal to remedy as far as may be the disappointments of delay.

Need we recount, Mr. Secretary, the part taken by the American boys in all the great battles of the war after March, 1918? May we mention that the qualities displayed by those boys represent the character and devotion of the parents who now come before you by this petition, praying for your action? Would you expect less energy and devotion to this purpose than was displayed by our soldier sons on the field of battle? Surely not.

We grant, Mr. Secretary, that you are and have been in accord with the sentiment as voiced herein and that you intend that the dead bodies shall be brought home, but this petition is directed solely to the question of acting now and not at any later date or hour. Shall we wait three years more and see the mothers, one by one, buried while her soldier boy lies over there?

It is the belief in this league that should France further interfere to cause delay that this country should use whatever means possible; diplomatic, financial, commercial, and industrial, even to severing business relations, to enforce the rights represented in this matter, and thereby determine if France now had or has given her real reasons for delay.

We hereby certify that the signatures of all the active members in this jurisdiction, together with pleading letters from others are on file in this office—thousands in number—which can be sent to Washington at a later time.

As a general public meeting will be held in this city on next Thursday in the interest of this movement a reply is respectfully desired by that time.

It is the intention to place this petition in the hands of the present members of the Cabinet and all other officials and all Members of the Congress.

With assurance of high personal regard, we beg to remain,

Very respectfully,

——— ———.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request—to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to use one minute and then I am going to yield the other two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE], and I will ask the Chair to notify me when I have used that much time.

Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] was discussing this bill earlier in the day questions were asked him as to the number of men who would be affected by this bill. I have endeavored to get the information. I find that The Adjutant General's office has carried its figures, in a great many instances, combined with the other branches of the service in such a way that it is almost impossible to segregate the number. It is definitely known, however, that 151 officers of the Regular Army either were killed or died of wounds received in battle during the war and that 20,258 enlisted men were either killed or died of wounds received during the war while in the regular service, of which a part were men who joined the regular service after war was declared and who volunteered individually as members of the regular service. All told, the killed in battle and those dying from wounds received in battle, of enlisted men of the whole Army, amounted to 77,394.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE]. [Applause].

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, because, speaking from my own experience and observation in the Army, I am opposed to any act that draws any distinction whatever between the families of the men who served in the Army during that period. I believe that the men who served in this war, whether in the National Guard, drafted Army, or the reserve are entitled to as much as those who served in the Regular Army. As I read this act it is to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relatives of officers or enlisted men of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or diseases not the result of their own misconduct in the Regular Army, and the word "thereafter" has been stricken out, and as it now reads it dates back to October 6, 1917, and covers practically the whole period of the war.

Now, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to this one fact about the professional soldier: When a man goes into the Regular Army as a profession, he necessarily undertakes all the hardships and hazards of that profession, the same as he would in any other profession, and for that reason he is not entitled to any more than a man in the reserve, drafted Army, or National Guard while on active duty. The men who made the greatest sacrifices were the men who left homes, business, and education and gave up all for the great cause. There were many volunteers who went into the Regular Army at the beginning of the war and others went into the National Guard.

Do you believe that we should in the name of fairness pass an act that would cut out the families of the men who were drafted or volunteered and went into the National Guard from the six months' pay and simply give it to the other men who by some stroke of luck happened to enter the Regular Army? I can safely say, judging from my own experience, that there will be three to one men who were killed outside of the Regular Army as compared to those who were killed or died by disease in the Regular Army. At that ratio the family of one Regular Army deceased soldier would receive six months' pay, while three families of National Guard, drafted, or reserve deceased soldiers would receive nothing.

Such a plan is unfair and wrong. Now, I want to call your attention to one other fact, and that is during October and November of 1918 the men in the cantonments died by the thousands from Spanish influenza. I have walked through the morgues and have seen those bodies lying there so thick that you could scarcely touch the ground between them. I have seen my own men who died in that manner, and I have seen their old gray-haired mothers look up to me through their tear-bedimmed eyes and say, "Oh, I have given all I had." And I say to you that heroes could do no more. Do you suppose we should begin back in 1917 and make this act apply to only those who served in the Regular Army, and leave the mothers and wives of those men who were drafted and died with no compensation except what they receive from insurance? The heart of a mother or wife or child of a drafted soldier can ache and suffer as much as the heart of a mother or wife of a Regular Army soldier. For those reasons I am in favor of making this act apply to all officers and enlisted men. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I desire to renew my motion to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to also insert as a part of the same the papers which I referred

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia sires to renew his request for unanimous consent to extend remarks in the RECORD by printing the papers indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] inform me that they are personally acquainted with these gentlemen, and I will not object.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to say to the gentleman that there is a propaganda among the undertakers of the country to further this work. He does not intend, does he, to print any of the literature that is being sent out?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The first intimation that I have had that there was any organization or scheme on the part of the undertakers I have heard here this afternoon. I am sure that this subject, which is so close to the hearts of the parents whose sons have fallen in France, ought never to be even questioned by such a foreign suggestion as that undertakers are at the bottom of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is recognized.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not care to use the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter, immediately upon official notification of the death from wounds or disease, not the result of his own misconduct, of any officer or enlisted man on the active list of the Regular Army or on the retired list when on active duty, from and after October 6, 1917, the Quartermaster General of the Army shall cause to be paid to the widow, and if there be no widow to the child or children, and if there be no widow or child to any other dependent relative of such officer or enlisted man previously designated by him, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer or enlisted man at the date of his death. The Secretary of War shall establish regulations requiring each officer and enlisted man having no wife or child to designate the proper dependent relative to whom this amount shall be paid in case of his death. Said amount shall be paid from funds appropriated for the pay of the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "That," strike out the word "hereafter" and insert "from and after October 6, 1917."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be disagreed to. If we disagree to it and agree to the amendment which comes next, in line 7, it would leave the bill without the retroactive features that make it applicable only to cases occurring after the passage of the law.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, it has not been explained during the general debate how it would be possible to distinguish as to who are members of the Regular Army and who are not, so far as the enlisted men are concerned. As to the officers it is simple, for there is a clearly defined list of officers.

Soon after the war began, or after we came into the war, the distinction between the Regular Army, National Guard, and National Army was supposed to have been wiped out. When a man enlisted or was drafted he might be assigned to a National Guard regiment, a Regular Army regiment, or a National Army regiment, and all the enlistments were made for the duration of the war; that is, all enlistments made after a certain time.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman will recall that at the time of the declaration of war the enlistments were thrown open individually into the Regular Army, and men enlisted voluntarily into the Regular Army for a period of three or four years, and then afterwards for the period of the war. There were also enlistments in the National Guard, and then there was the draft. On a fixed date the War Department, as the gentleman will recall, issued an order that no longer would they take any voluntary enlistments at all, and from that day on everybody went into the Army of the United States.

Mr. TILSON. All enlistments were made for the period of the war after a certain time. Instead of a man enlisting in the Regular Army for three years or four years, or any specified time, as had been previously done, he enlisted for the war.

Mr. CALDWELL. But the gentleman will remember that the enlistments were in the various branches of the service, just as distinct as the Regular Army, the National Guard, the Marine Corps, and in the Navy.

Mr. TILSON. Then the distinction fails, because if the men enlisted indiscriminately in the Regular Army or National Guard——

Mr. CALDWELL. Not indiscriminately. A man chose his service.

Mr. TILSON. However, they were all enlisted for the period of the war. In the case of the man who was in the Regular Army prior to the war under an enlistment for a certain number of years, there is some reason for the distinction, but when a man enlisted in or was assigned to one of the so-called Regular Army regiments after the war began, without enlisting for any certain period except for the period of the war, I do not see how it is possible or proper to distinguish him from a man who enlisted in or was assigned to any other organization of the Army. I do not understand why the latter should be discriminated against.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. I assume that my former colleague on the committee well remembers the legislation that provided that it was immaterial in which branch of the service a man served; that when the emergency ended he was entitled to his discharge.

Mr. TILSON. I have that in mind.

Mr. McKENZIE. I think this law very properly and clearly takes care of the men who were in the Regular Army at the time of the breaking out of the war, and to those this would properly apply.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman is entirely correct; but after that event I am unable to understand how you are going to unscramble the eggs, as the gentleman from Illinois, our dear Uncle JOE, sometimes says. How are you going to distinguish one class from the others?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would not this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more in order to answer the inquiry of my friend from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would not this be the test, that all those men who enlisted for the three-year period in the Regular Army would be considered for the purpose of this act as belonging to the Regular Army, and the others "duration" soldiers?

Mr. TILSON. If so, there would not be such a very great number of the former. It is undoubtedly the fact that a very considerable number of men who served in so-called Regular Army regiments and divisions during the war were in every respect on the same footing as the men in the other organizations of the service which were not so labeled.

Mr. LITTLE. Why does not that apply to officers?

Mr. TILSON. It does apply to officers and to those men who enlisted in the Regular Army prior to the war.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I just wanted to ask the gentleman this question: Is it the contention that everybody who went into the Army of the United States after the war began is a member of the Regular Army?

Mr. TILSON. No. They were all members of the Army of the United States, as I believe they called it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Well, then, if they were all members of the Army of the United States, and not of the Regular Army, how does that difficulty arise that seems to be in the gentleman's mind?

Mr. TILSON. Members of the Regular Army became members of the Army of the United States, but they did not thereby cease to be members of the Regular Army. The converse, however, was not true. Members of the Army of the United States did not thereby become members of the Regular Army.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. As I understand from the gentleman, those men who went into the Army after the declaration of hostilities were not in the Regular Army.

Mr. TILSON. They were assigned to and served in Regular Army organizations, but as it seems to me they were in no respect on a different footing from other "duration of the war" men.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Then if they are not in the Regular Army, there is the distinction right there.

Mr. TILSON. As I have stated, they served in Regular Army organizations, and I was trying to ascertain from some member of the Committee on Military Affairs just where and how the line would be drawn in the application of this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentlemen who are in favor of the Mann proposition, if I may be permitted to designate it as such, to the fact that if the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Illinois is adopted by this House you are going to create a distinction between the men who were killed in the first battles and those who were killed in the later battles.

The first operations of the American Army that demonstrated what American manhood could do were had before October 6, 1917. Then, following that, the next operations were where the greatest force ever put forward by our people in the history of our whole nation was put forward by the First, Second, Third, and Fourth Divisions of the Regular Army. I do not see how we in conscience can deny this to those men who for the period of their whole lives, practically up to the time they went into those battles, and who when they enlisted said, "We will bear the colors of this country and we will fight its battles on every field where we are sent," and some of those men went to Chateau-Thierry and at the battle between Soissons and Chateau-Thierry——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is wrong in his dates.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. You are a year out.

Mr. CALDWELL. I am talking about those both before and after that date. I know what the gentleman refers to. I said that was the second place.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Where was the action before October 6, 1917?

Mr. CALDWELL. They went over there in July, 1917, and were in action.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Where? In the Toule sector?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In action?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes. This is what I have to say: As for these men who enlisted in the United States Army, many of them had been in there for several years and had devoted their time to this service. A great many of them were married and had children, and those people knew that the contract of service existing between the regular soldier and his Government was that in the case of his death during the time of his enlistment the United States Government would see to it that his widow and children should have, in addition to the other things which the law has specified, six months' pay, six times $15 a month. And what Member of Congress is going to say that the widows and children of those men who have devoted their lives to preparing themselves for the battle which was fought in the interest of our country shall not have six times $15?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's amendment is of the third degree. There are two amendments pending that have not been acted upon.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I rise in opposition to the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] is still pending. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I want to speak in opposition to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is exhausted on the committee amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's motion is in the third degree. There are two amendments pending now.

Mr. RAYBURN. What amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendment and the amendment of the gentleman from New York to strike out. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am very much opposed to the amendment of the House Committee on Military Affairs which was placed in line 3 of page 1, and I am very much in favor of the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Of course, the primary purpose of this legislation is to restore the original law that was repealed on the 6th of October, 1917, which was that the families of the soldiers in the Regular Army who died from disease or were killed should receive six months' pay. The amendment which the Committee on Military Affairs has put in here by putting in the words "from and after October 6, 1917," and striking out the word "hereafter" is a retroactive feature which is absolutely gratuitous to the families of those who happened to be members of the Regular Army, because of the fact that they were the beneficiaries under the war-risk insurance act just as much as the families of those who were drafted and those who volunteered in the National Army, where they had died or had sacrificed their lives in one way or another. They have been the recipients under the war-risk insurance act just as the families of those in the National Army. Now they come along and propose in addition a gratuity of six months' pay. They were the recipients under the war-risk insurance act just as much as the families of members of the National Army.

The committee does not know how much it will cost. The acting chairman of the committee stated that he did not know how many men were killed or had died whose families would be the beneficiaries under this retroactive feature. He has no idea of the number of dollars it will cost, and yet the retroactive feature is absolutely gratuitous to those who happen to be the children or the wives of those who died while serving as members of the Regular Army.

Why should you do it? It is all right to restore the original law now, provided section 3 of the Senate bill is restored, because if you do you simply restore the old law and give those who were members of the Regular Army in peace time what they would have gotten before. But if you put that premium on that you will say that those who were drawn out of the pursuits of peace, either voluntarily or by the draft, and went out and helped win this war shall be discriminated against, and you differentiate between them and those who happened to be in the Regular Army.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] says the incentive to do that is an incentive to volunteer in the Regular Army. If you strike out the words "from and after October 6, 1917," and restore section 3 of the Senate bill, that incentive to join the Regular Army will be just the same as it was before. But if you are going to enact it as reported by the House committee, then you ought to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and give the wives or children of those who volunteered and those who were drafted into the National Army the same benefits as you give to those who were in the Regular Army.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] said that one of the main purposes of this bill was that if a soldier in one part of the United States should die there, away from his family, they could go to the funeral and attend the ceremony. I do not understand why the gentleman from Illinois forgot to mention the fact that many a poor woman's husband and many a poor child's father died on the battle line in France, under shot and shell, in defense of this country, and that poor wife and those poor children not only never had the opportunity to attend his funeral but perhaps never will have an opportunity to look upon his grave. I say this is absolutely a gratuitous proposition and there is nothing justifiable in voting to retain the words "October 6, 1917."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Time has not expired in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that all time has expired. This is an amendment to a committee amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am not offering any amendment. I rise in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think the gentleman is entitled to recognition to oppose the motion made by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to say this in the interest of the enforcement of the rules of the House. It seems to me the situation is very clear. The gentleman from Illinois debated the committee amendment for five minutes. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] debated the amendment for five minutes. Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] offered an amendment to the amendment, which he debated for five minutes. Then the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] arose in opposition to that amendment. Therefore the debate is exhausted.

Mr. CALDWELL. No; I withdrew my amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman had no right to withdraw his amendment except by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the proposition. The time for debate on the committee amendment was exhausted. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] moved to strike out the last word, and his amendment was pending when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] arose and desired recognition. Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] withdrew his amendment, and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Kentucky, who moved to strike out the last word and discussed his amendment for five minutes. Five minutes remained in opposition to the motion to strike out the last word. The Chair then recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the Chair permit me to suggest that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] had no right to withdraw his amendment except by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. There was no objection, and the Chair recognized the right of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] to make the motion. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] is entitled to recognition in opposition to the motion made by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is not a member of the committee who was first on his feet entitled to priority of recognition?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not if another Member is recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, there has been quite a good deal of talk here about treating the soldiers exactly the same under the law. It seems to me that would be a very easy matter to handle in the bill that we have before us. If the first committee amendment is voted down, and the second committee amendment is carried, and the third committee amendment is carried, then everybody who has been in this war from October 6, 1917, until this law takes effect will stand exactly in the same status. There will be no question of discrimination. It seems to me that since we have been operating under the law of October 6, 1917, which put all the men in the Army upon the same footing, certainly even though it was not wise to do that, yet as we have recognized the principle that every man in the Army was as patriotic as every other man in the Army, we would remove all of this criticism of this bill, and probably just criticism, and we would be doing exact justice by all alike by letting the law take effect from the passage of this act.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Suppose this amendment is defeated. What will be the status of the volunteer soldier or the drafted man in case of a future war? Will you not have this discrimination?

Mr. RAYBURN. It will not affect any future war, because we will pass new legislation providing for the raising of an army.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. The drafted man would be discriminated against, would he not, unless you pass new legislation?

Mr. RAYBURN. No, because it would apply to all alike.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. It would apply to all the Regular Army.

Mr. RAYBURN. The National Army is supposed to be demobilized. It has been announced several times that it has been demobilized.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. But from now on.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

The question being taken, the first committee amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the second committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "duty" strike out "from and after October 6, 1917."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Let us agree to this amendment which strikes out all of the retroactive features.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee would make a great mistake by striking out the provision which makes this measure retroactive. During the war there were a number of instances where officers died or were killed who were not protected by Government insurance, who left their families absolutely helpless, and to do this would subject these men to very grave injustice.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Were there not a number of volunteer officers——

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, let me say that the gentleman from Massachusetts is making the same mistake that has been made many times to-day on the floor of this House by endeavoring to confound this legislation primarily enacted for the regular service with the service rendered by temporary officers and men enlisted for the period of the war. I do not want for a minute to refuse to give everything that is due to the men who went into the temporary service. I think they should have everything that we can do for them, but this is intended for the regular service, which is of an entirely different nature from the service rendered by the other men, and we should consider it purely in that light.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is advancing as an argument that some officers of the Regular Army failed to take out insurance and therefore their dependents should have six months' gratuity.

Mr. ANTHONY. We are penalizing the families because of the failure of the husband to take out insurance.

Mr. WALSH. How are you going to take care of the families of the volunteer officers who failed to take out insurance?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are not considered on the same basis as the officers of the Regular Army for the reason that they have not given 15 or 20 years of their life to the Government.

Mr. WALSH. They have given their lives in the defense of their country.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not minimizing that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. To oppose the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has consumed five minutes——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I beg the Chairman's pardon, I did not use a half a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. When any time is used under the five-minute rule the time can not be farmed out, and that exhausts the five minutes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Chairman is entirely mistaken; there never has been any such ruling. Of course, a Member who gets the floor for five minutes can not farm out his time by yielding to some one else, but he can yield the floor. The rule provides that there may be five minutes used for and five minutes against the amendment. Some one else can use the time. The Chair is slightly mistaken in his recollection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had made inquiry, but is frank to state that he has not examined the precedents. Without objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the trouble this afternoon in this debate is that there has been too much discussion of matters that do not pertain to the bill. The relative merits of the Regular Army officers and the volunteer officers should not be the point of discussion. I think it is most unsoldierly, with all due respect to the colonel of Philippine Islands fame, the gentleman from Kansas, to make the criticism that he so often makes on the floor of the House. After all, we wore the same uniform, and the Army officer is a gallant, brave, and able soldier. The question is whether the families of these officers shall have the six months' allowance, as the law formerly provided. The officer knew that if he died in the service his family would receive six months' pay and allowance. The real reason is, as everyone knows, that the Regular Army officer lives with his family at the post or the barracks or anywhere where his military duties call him, and that when he dies the family is compelled to move out of the house and find a home elsewhere. So that the families of these officers who died after October 6, 1917, have absolutely no home. They are destitute, and this talk that they have the benefit of the war-risk insurance is misleading, because all that the widow receives is $57 a month if the officer carried the full $10,000 insurance. So it is not a question of giving the officer's family more consideration than another set of officers, but it is carrying out a quasi contractual obligation on the part of the Government with the families of these officers that they would receive six months' allowance in case of death, and that is all there is to it. If we do not allow sufficient compensation to the injured and crippled officers not in the regular status, that is our own fault. We can pass any measure we desire in regard to that, and this discussion that we have had in regard to the volunteers has no part in deciding the merits of this bill. All we have before us is the question, Are we going to keep faith with the families of these officers who expected the six months' allowance and who did not know it was repealed? If the Congress did not know it, how could you expect the officers or their families to know that it was repealed? In all fairness and justice let us be manly about this and help those families by granting this compensation.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman says that the House did not know that this was repealed.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Judging from the discussion this afternoon, I think so.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will examine the discussion and debates of the war-risk insurance act, he will find that we did know it.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Does not the gentleman think the war-risk insurance and compensation is an ample substitute for the few dollars that would be granted by this bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is not ample, and the gentleman knows it is not ample. All the widow will receive is $57 a month, and she needs money to set up a new home. These families are really poor and depend on this allowance to move to their new home and get started. With the pay we allow our officers, there is no possibility under present living conditions to save for just such an emergency.

Mr. LITTLE. Does not the gentleman think the compensation and $10,000——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But she does not get the $10,000, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. LITTLE. She gets $10,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. She gets $57 a month.

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And what is she going to do with it?

Mr. LITTLE. Use it to live on.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, after listening to the debate this afternoon I believe the only arguments that have been offered why this gratuity, because that is all I can call it, should be granted are two—one, the negligence of the Regular Army officer or enlisted man to avail himself of the privileges of the war-risk insurance, and the other, that he had led an extravagant life and has not been able to save anything.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I can not yield. Those two arguments have been offered as a reason why the dependents of the Regular should be especially cared for as against the ordinary enlisted man. I want to call the committee's attention to the fact that the advocates of this bill continually bring forth the argument that they are only restoring the old law. I would like to have them tell this committee why the old law was taken off the statute books? It was taken off because they thought they had something better in the way of a war-risk insurance and the compensation that is available under that act. If we are going to restore this statute, we must either deprive the Regular Army soldier of the benefits of the war-risk insurance act or doubly compensate him against any other soldier that may ever fight in the future, without special legislation. It does not seem to me that the Army needs double compensation. I am willing to give the Regular Army soldier from this on the six months' pay if we take away his benefits under the war-risk act. Of course, the advocates of this bill say that the soldier pays for his insurance under the war-risk act. He does not pay the full cost of the insurance, as you will discover when you get your reports of the cost of conducting the War Risk Insurance Bureau. You will find that the Army is not making the war-risk insurance a self-sustaining proposition, nor is it intended so to do. So, if you are going to continue the war risk, which was passed to offset this proposition, then give him one or the other, but I can see no justice in giving him both.

Here is another condition to which I would like to call the attention of the committee. Suppose I enlisted in the Regulars when the war broke out for the duration of the war, and you enlisted, volunteered, in the National Army. We were both killed. My widow gets one-half of a year's pay—I do not care whether it is $300 or $3,000—and your widow gets nothing. You can never convince your widow by all of the argument that you can make on the floor of the House that her Government has been just and fair to her, and I do not believe it would be just and fair to her under those circumstances. If you are going to make this act a gratuity and put it on the statute books, we ought to strike out the words "Regular Army" and make it applicable to every boy that fought, or else give them a compensation under the war-risk insurance and nothing more. I want to know how you are going to answer the proposition that the boy out at Walter Reed is going to put to you who has had all his earning power taken away from him because of the sacrifices that he has made. You are compelling him to be satisfied with the war-risk insurance and the benefits that will accrue to any man who availed himself of that opportunity, and yet we are here this afternoon bowing down to the Regular Army and paying them an extra bonus that we say that the man can not have who volunteered or was conscripted. The argument that is offered that the Regular has given 25 or 30 years of his life does not carry any weight with me for the simple reason that as a young man he chose his profession. His profession, except only in the time of war, is the safest, cleanest, finest work that there is. He does not have a great salary attached to it, but neither do thousands of other business men. The Army officer and the Army Regulars to-day are drawing compensation as great as the great army of school-teachers, and not one of the latter ever gets any recognition, although they are serving a purpose in this country which is just as necessary as that of the Regular Army officer, and they are doing it just as efficiently. The Army officer, in addition to getting his salary, gets certain additions in the way of living accommodations which make his salary decidedly in advance of what the pay roll calls for. I want to say in conclusion that I think that to pass legislation of this kind is decidedly out of keeping with our standards of fair play.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can explain exactly to the satisfaction of the House what the committee had in mind when this bill was brought before it. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is entirely mistaken when he says that the House understood, in enacting the war-risk insurance legislation, that we wiped this particular provision out of the law. We did provide that there should be no distinction between the officers and men, and that is probably correct, but here is what happened: A few weeks after that act was passed a lady, probably 50 or 60 years old, came into my office and said to me that a strange situation had developed; that her husband, a Regular Army officer, had died at one of the western posts; that he was a man beyond the age of going overseas, and they did not know that this provision had been wiped off the statute books, and had not taken advantage of the provisions of the war-risk insurance act. The husband died, and she made application through the proper channels for the payment of the six months' pay, and much to her surprise and consternation a ruling was made by the Comptroller of the Treasury that the provisions of the war-risk insurance act had repealed automatically the act in respect to six months' pay. I thought that must be a mistake, and we took it up and found that it was not a mistake; that they had so ruled. Later this bill was introduced. What the bill was intended to do when we passed it through our committee was simply to leave these Regular Army officers and men in the same status they were in when the act was passed. I doubt if there is a single officer or man in the Regular Army who went overseas or who contemplated going overseas, or was killed or wounded in action, who had not taken advantage of the war-risk insurance act, and the cases which have been called to our attention are cases of men who were in this country serving in some capacity, probably called from the retired list and doing duty which they knew would not take them overseas and would not put them in any additional risk, and they simply rested under the provision as they thought it still remained.

You will find very few cases where this will apply, and to take care of these few cases was the purpose we had in view.

Mr. LAYTON. Why not bring in a separate bill to provide for those particular cases?

Mr. CRAGO. That would be legislation for individuals and, of course, would hardly be a subject of general legislation. Now, we were told this would apply to a very few cases, cases of real hardship, where men's families were practically left destitute or the widow was without any means. She had even borrowed money in this particular case before she could bury her husband.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman does not mean that this bill is only confined to these particular cases?

Mr. CRAGO. We only intend to provide for cases in the Regular Army where men had died believing, as they did, that they were protected by this six months' pay.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In order to do that you provided for all of them?

Mr. CRAGO. No; I do not think we have.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. All in the Regular Army.

Mr. CRAGO. I was preparing to say I think there should be some provision that where these men are taken care of under the war-risk insurance act this should not apply or it should be taken out. I do not agree with the Secretary of War in the position, but we should in all fairness leave that provision in retroactive to the date when the war-risk insurance act was passed. Otherwise we will do an injustice to some people who are not able to bear it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The Committee on Military Affairs is a brilliant committee and ought to be able to bring in a bill that would cover what they desire to cover without covering a whole lot of things. I take it for a certain thing as to officers and men during the war the Government in the end will not make a distinction in the payment which it makes in favor of the Regular Army as against the Volunteer Army.

Mr. CRAGO. There is not anything against the Volunteer officers or men. They never were entitled to this.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Nobody was entitled to it; it was a gratuity.

Mr. CRAGO. It was an act of Congress.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It was a gratuity.

Mr. CRAGO. And I will say in answer to the gentleman's statement about the committee being able to bring in a bill, this is a Senate bill prepared by the War Department, and I want frankly to state what our position in the committee was in the premises, because we knew about these individual cases——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This is a Senate bill, and the first bill prepared was a House bill, sent to the House Committee on Military Affairs——

Mr. CRAGO. By the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Which took no action upon it.

Mr. CRAGO. I think the fair thing for us to do, in view of the whole situation, is to pass such a bill as will take care of cases that have not been cared for by the war-risk insurance act. You will find that it will not embrace more than a few dozen cases——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. You can not change this bill—bring in a bill to that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PLATT. This has to do with a great many more enlisted men than with officers around Army posts.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a motion to strike out the last two or three words, but it would be an amendment in the third degree, and I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two or three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LITTLE. I shall have to object, as the gentleman objected to giving me more time.

Mr. CALDWELL. I yielded the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. And I yielded you an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. May we have the amendment reported again, so we may understand it?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I was on my feet asking for a division.

Mr. WALSH. Not until after the Chair had announced the vote.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I was on my feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the demand for a division, and waited a sufficient length of time and then declared the amendment carried.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 2 and 3, after the word "man," strike out the words "previously designated by him."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the purpose of this amendment is to provide that those who are dependent and who have not previously been designated as dependents may have the benefits of the provisions of this bill. There are many cases where officers did not make an allotment to a mother or to a dependent sister. He has made no designation of anyone being dependent upon him, electing, as has been done in many cases, to make provision out of his pay by sending from time to time a check. I have a concrete case in mind where a young officer, a graduate of West Point about the time we got into this war, was in the service on this side until after the armistice, was then sent over to Germany, and was killed at Coblenz last week. That young man sent his mother an allowance every month out of his salary. She never had been designated a dependent, notwithstanding the fact that she was and is a dependent. If this bill becomes a law as it is without this proposed amendment, cases of the character I have mentioned could in no case receive the benefits of this act. Therefore it occurs to me that the dependence in the case should be determined by the facts. Under the war-risk act the soldier would not have of necessity to make allotment for his mother.

That was not a compulsory allotment. And in many cases a private during this war did not make that allotment, but elected to send out of his salary to his mother money at the end of the month or whenever he received his pay. I do not think it was the intention of the committee that the real dependents, when the facts show that they are dependent, should be denied the benefits of this bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman overlooks the fact that what the committee is trying to do is to bring back the act as it originally stood when it was repealed by the war-risk insurance law, and nothing else. Under the gentleman's amendment it would bring in a lot of relatives who were not entitled.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I would not bring back a single person who is not intended to be covered by this act, but I would make it clear that the dependent under this act shall not be deprived of the benefits of it by reason of some unfortunate language. As I have stated, there are many private soldiers and officers who have not designated their mothers, even, as dependents, but they have been contributing each month to their support. In cases of that character such dependent would absolutely be denied the benefits of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman speaks of the fact that a soldier's mother would not get it if we did not strike out the words referred to. If he reads the language, it says "to any other dependent relative."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman is mistaken. Any other dependent relative "previously designated." That is what I want to get out of there. His mother would not get a cent under the provisions of this bill unless she had been previously designated.

Mr. ANTHONY. If a soldier does not think enough of that "other relative designated," do you think it ought to be thrown out?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have attempted to bring to the attention of the committee the fact that they do think enough of them, and have repeatedly, constantly, and consistently paid them out of their wages rather than to designate them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the gentleman knows that every officer and soldier at the time of his enlistment in the service designates some relative.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. He does not designate some relative as his dependent, but some one as an emergency friend, to whom communications can be made.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And also to whom his belongings should go.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That does not make them dependent. If I go in the Army to-day, under the law as it is, I designate some one who shall be communicated with and to whom my personal effects shall be sent if I am killed, but I do not think such persons would be considered as dependent upon me necessarily.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] is designed to correct a misfortune which does sometimes arise, and we have on a number of occasions, by a special act of Congress, provided that the gratuity of six months should be paid to the person, as shown by the proof, who should receive it. But if we agree to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana it will result in a great many other people being hampered and harassed and delayed, and the War Department made into a tribunal which, in order to settle these questions, will have to acquire a large amount of proof, according to the usual lines of red tape. The soldier is given the opportunity to designate the dependent relative under the terms of the bill. Now, the amendment would strike out the right to designate anyone, and the soldier could have a half dozen dependent relatives. If he has only the one, it becomes then a matter of proof to show whether such person was dependent or not before he can get the money. Under the existing practice, or the practice that was in existence, the designation of somebody was itself sufficient proof that that person was a dependent relative, and immediately upon the proof of death the money was paid. But if there be no designation, and the money is to be paid to some dependent, you have got to have proof as to the dependency, and if there are several dependent relatives, as there may be, you have got to figure out how it is to be divided. There would be confusion beyond belief, and many a person who otherwise would receive this gratuity within a short time after the course of a few years will still be wondering when it will be settled.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LONGWORTH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3452. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Detroit, Mich., a municipal corporation, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the American channel of the Detroit River at Belle Isle.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment joint resolution (H. J. Res. 213) continuing temporarily certain allowances to officers of the Navy, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 6857) to authorize the change of the name of the steamer Charlotte Graveraet Breitung to T. K. Maher.

SIX MONTHS' PAY TO DEPENDENTS OF DECEASED ARMY MEN.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CONNALLY offers the following amendment: Page 1, line 7, after the word "duty," insert "or of the death from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct, of any officer or enlisted man in the National Guard or the Reserve Corps when in the active Federal military service of the United States."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. This bill is wholly in reference to the men in the Regular Army of the United States, a particular class, and under the rulings for many years it is not in order to propose by way of amendment to insert another class.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss the point of order, although I think it is sound, but I would like to say just a word before we leave this section. The truth about this whole matter is that it is an attempt to reenact an old statute, but it has been bungled up by undertaking to make it retroactive, and that part of the bill has been stricken out. This is a simple proposition.

Prior to the war we had a law that made provision for the payment of six months' salary to the widow of a deceased Army officer. When we got into the war we passed the war-risk insurance bill and put all the men in the Army on an equality, which was right. Men in the Regular Army and officers in the Reserve and National Guard became officers and men of the Army of the United States. And to my mind that was right. I would favor the reenactment of the old law. I believe it was a just law. But I would put at the end of section 1, and I assume that some of the members of the committee will probably do so, an amendment to take care of the specific case such as was mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO], providing that where an officer had not taken advantage of the war-risk insurance law, then in that event his widow should be entitled to compensation under this act.

But where the officer had taken advantage of the war-risk insurance law his widow should not now be permitted to come in and enjoy the emoluments provided for in this law. If such an amendment can be adopted it seems to me that that ought to end this bill. Strike out all the rest of it and put the old law back on the statute books. It is for you members of the committee to vote whether or not you believe in that character of legislation. If you do, then simply let the bill go through. If you do not believe in that kind of legislation and believe that the former law was wrong, then kill this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I am very well prepared to discuss this point of order, because I am not very well versed in parliamentary law. Yet, according to my understanding of the legislation on the subject of the Army heretofore, under the national-defense act the Regular Army was established and organized, and also that same legislation covered the Reserve Corps and the National Guard, and it provided by its terms that at any time under certain circumstances the Reserve Corps and the National Guard could be called into the active service by the President of the United States, and that when it is called into that service it is subject to the same rules, laws, and regulations as the Regular Army is subject to.

Now, my amendment applies only to the National Guard and the Reserve Corps when in active Federal service. It seems to me that under that situation the National Guard and the Reserve Corps become component parts of the Regular Army of the United States. I know that there has been a fiction maintained during the war that they had the Regular Army Establishment and had the National Guard Army, and then they had the National Army; but later on, without any legislation whatever, the War Department abolished those distinctions and established what was known as the Army of the United States, and under that regulation there was no distinction between a man who served in the Regular Army and one who enlisted in the National Guard and one who was drafted into the National Army.

Now, under the terms of the amendment which I have offered it becomes effective only when the National Guard and the Reserve Corps are, by the terms of law, incorporated into the Regular Army, and if under those circumstances they become a part of the Regular Army, it would seem that an amendment to this bill of the tenor of the one that I have introduced would be in order, because the Regular Army in time of peace is one thing, and the Regular Army when expanded by draft and the addition of the National Guard or the Reserve Corps is still the Regular Army. These two branches of the service are simply superadded to the peace-time establishment of the Regular Army under the terms of the legislation enacted by this Congress, and I respectfully submit to the Chair that under that situation my amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The bill under consideration is one to provide for the payment of certain pay to the widow, children, or designated dependent relatives of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death resulted from wounds or disease and not from his own misconduct. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] would extend this same payment to the widows and children and designated relatives of officers and enlisted men of the National Guard or the Reserve Corps. Clearly the amendment is subject to the point of order and is not germane to the section, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment on page 2, line 10. After the word "Army," insert the following: "Provided, That payments under this act shall be made to the beneficiary named herein in the case of the death of any officer or enlisted man mentioned therein after October 6, 1917, who was not covered by insurance under the war-risk insurance act."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY offers the following amendment: On page 2, line 10, after the word "Army," insert the following: "Provided, That payments under this act shall be made to the beneficiary named herein in the case of the death of any officer or enlisted man mentioned therein after October 6, 1917, who was not covered by insurance under the war-risk insurance act."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is to cover the objections which have been made by several Members of the House, that under the original language of the bill the beneficiaries would get not only the gratuity which the bill carries but also the payments under the war-risk insurance act. If we adopt the proviso that has been offered and is now pending, the beneficiary will receive the gratuity only, or the war-risk payment, as the case may be, under the retroactive provision.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. The insurance, I will say to the gentleman from Kansas, is not a gratuity. It is a question of contract with the Government.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the insurance. What we propose to do is purely a gratuity.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman's amendment names the insurance, the compensation under the act. That is what his family is getting if he is killed. We should not provide for this man any more than any other man in the Army who had the chance to contract for insurance and failed to do it, giving him this benefit back, unless we apply it to every man in the Army and give him a paid-up insurance policy. The gentleman's amendment ought not to prevail. I do not believe the gentleman fully understood the situation.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand it quite clearly.

Mr. RAYBURN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, of course the reference he made to the war-risk insurance act is proper in the gentleman's amendment, is it not?

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman referred to the war-risk insurance.

Mr. MCKENZIE. It should be the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; it should be the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RAYBURN. I rise in opposition to the amendment. That is exactly the objection I have to the gentleman's amendment. He says insurance under the war-risk insurance act. When a man had the insurance contract placed before him and he said, "I do not want any insurance," you had just as well give it to him as to give it to these men. You had just as well say that every man in the Army, whether he desired insurance or not, should have it. But now wait a moment. If this man died, his people are getting compensation under the war-risk insurance act, and nothing we can do here will change that. That has not been taken away from him. Unless you intend to give him this gratuity because he did not take out this insurance, then this is entirely useless.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman want to change the word "insurance" to "compensation"?

Mr. RAYBURN. They get the compensation anyhow without our saying anything about it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If you insert the word "compensation," the amendment means nothing, because they already get the compensation.

Mr. RAYBURN. Exactly. You are just nullifying the second committee amendment by putting in the gentleman's amendment at this place.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I should like to get a little information from somebody who knows a good deal more than I do about this. Take the case, for instance, of a Regular Army officer who had been serving in the Army for many years and who thought the Government of the United States and the Army were all that there was. It is true, he was offered an opportunity to get insurance. Well, he had not been used to dealing with anything financial except to receive his salary and pay his current bills. He did not know anything about insurance and gave no thought to it. He took out no insurance. Following the practice for many years, he assumed that if he was killed his widow would at least get six months' pay. Now, he is killed. Is there any justice in giving his widow a special provision?

Mr. RAYBURN. No.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What does she get under existing law?

Mr. RAYBURN. She gets $25 a month.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. She gets compensation.

Mr. RAYBURN. She gets $25 a month and $10 for the first child, and on up until she gets $75, if she has that many children. Her pension is much higher than the pensions for the soldiers of the Civil War and the Spanish-American War.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. On the contrary, probably much lower in the case of officers. Is not that so? Twenty-five dollars a month is certainly lower than in the case of the widows of most officers.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know anything about the old pension law. I asked somebody a moment ago who said that the pension for the widow of an officer and the widow of a private under the general pension law was the same.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Whoever said that was entirely mistaken and not familiar with the law at all. Of course, as to service pensions that is true, but service pensions came long after the original pension law. For deaths during the Civil War the pensions were quite different. I think a widow's pension was 50 per cent of the officer's salary, perhaps, up to a certain amount. Gentlemen are confusing the law providing pensions for death incurred by reason of Army service and service pensions. Of course, under a service-pension law there is no distinction between the widows of officers and the widows of enlisted men. I was wondering whether this language would cover the case. I myself hestitate very much in trying to interpret the meaning of language written on the spur of the moment when it is on a very technical subject.

Mr. RAYBURN. A great many young men went into the Army and did not take out insurance, and some of them were killed. For four months after they were taken into the Army they were covered by automatic insurance, but a great many of them were killed after that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Their people are coming in, and in a great many instances they say they feel that they have been discriminated against; that their son did not take out any insurance, while the son of the man next door did. That man deprived himself of $6 or $7 a month while this one wanted to spend that money and did not take out any insurance. The Army officer who wanted to spend his money for something else is in the same shape. He did not want to take out insurance. He did not help keep the bureau alive. He did not help to build up its reserve.

Mr. LITTLE. But this puts a premium on negligence and a penalty on diligence.

Mr. RAYBURN. Exactly so.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. I think this will pretty nearly answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. Is it not the ruling of the War Risk Insurance Bureau that any man who did not declare affirmatively that he did not desire insurance is considered to have been insured?

Mr. RAYBURN. For four months after he entered the service, but not all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. CALDWELL) there were—ayes 19, noes 32.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOOD of Indiana offers the following amendment: After the word "children," in line 9, page 1, insert "or father or mother"; also, after the word "child," in line 1, page 2, add the words "or father or mother."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it occurs to me that this amendment should be adopted. Ninety-five per cent of the boys who go into the Regular Army come from the poor families of this country. They do not come from the rich. They come from those families where the fathers or mothers are dependent. In many cases these young men in the Regular Army are contributing constantly to the support of a dependent father or a dependent mother. It seems to me that if anyone is entitled to the provisions of this act it is the mother who gave him birth. She ought to be designated as one of the dependents, or she ought to be the one entitled to receive the benefit of the provision without being designated as a dependent.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Who under the gentleman's amendment would get it, the father or the mother, if they were both living?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They would get it jointly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They might not; which one would get it?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That might possibly depend upon the laws of the State where it was applied.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That might require a statutory construction under the State laws. The bill says widow or child, and under the language the widow gets it if she is living. If there be no widow the child gets it. Under the gentleman's amendment there is no provision in favor of the mother as against the father. It says father or mother, and under that language they would pay it to the father first.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment so as to read: "To the father and mother jointly if living, or to the survivor."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman from Indiana will get into the same difficulty that the gentleman from Illinois called his attention to. The father and mother may be living separately. The father might have gone off and deserted the mother. Why does not the gentleman say, "If there be no widow, to the child or children; and if there be no child or children, then to the mother; and if there be no mother, then to the father"? Then you would get it so that the mother would inherit it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But, after all, is it not better for the soldier to designate the father or mother, as the bill provides?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. But suppose the soldier has not done it. I have heretofore called the attention of the House to a concrete case.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think since I have been in the House there have been half a dozen of these cases in the whole Army.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And I expect there have been 10,000 cases, or perhaps half that number, to which the gentleman's attention has not been called.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, if it was an Army officer, attention would have been called to it; the gentleman need not forget that.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Perhaps so, if an officer; but there are thousands of privates whose cases are never called to your attention. I am speaking in behalf of common justice and common humanity and of the mothers who gave these boys birth; and they ought to be entitled to it at the hands of this House instead of being kept out of it by resorting to technicalities.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, nobody seeks to keep the mother from getting the payments. The soldier can designate the mother, and it may be that he wants to designate his foster mother. We passed a bill not long ago to permit the money to be paid to the foster mother of the soldier instead of to the mother. There are many cases where the soldier may not want to pay the money to the father and many cases where he would prefer to pay it to his father over his mother. He has the right to designate under the law. Now, I appreciate the situation that the gentleman from Indiana wants to reach, but in order to reach it his amendment will complicate all the other cases, complicate every other case, in order to possibly take care of one case which he mentions out of a thousand, and would complicate the other 999. It ought to be left so that it will be easy and simple in disposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "children," line 9, page 1, insert "or father or mother jointly if living, or to the survivor"; also, after the word "child," line 1, page 2, add the following words: "or father or mother jointly if living, or to the survivor."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, after the word "him," strike out the language ", an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer or enlisted man at the date of his death" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the sum of $300."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, in its present form I intend to vote against this bill for three reasons: First, because it discriminates against the National Guard and the Reserves in favor of the Regular Army; second, because it discriminates against the widow and children of a private in favor of the widow and children of an officer; and third, because it seeks to reenact the old law of giving six months' pay to the widow of an officer which was superseded by the war-risk insurance act.

This House adopted a policy in passing by an overwhelming vote the Black amendment to the war-risk insurance act, placing all men on an equal footing when they give their lives to their country.

Under this bill the widow and little children of a private will receive $198, while the widow and children of some officers could receive as much as twenty times that amount.

In other words, when a private gives his life for his country he has given just as much of value to his flag as the officer does who gives his life. The life of a private is worth just as much to his widow and little children as the life of an officer is to his. I do not see why there should be any discrimination at all. I think if the House meant it as a policy in adopting the Black amendment, it should likewise adopt this amendment. The committee has admitted here on the floor of the House that this proposed legislation is the result of a complaint coming from the widow of an officer, not the widow of a private—an officer whose wife was kept out of this allowance by reason of the fact that the old law had been superseded by the war-risk insurance act and because the officer had failed to take out any insurance. The private was supposed to have been informed with regard to the insurance act by the officer. Every officer was fully advised regarding its provisions. No officer can claim that he did not have notice of the fact that the war-risk insurance act superseded this old law. What does the widow of an officer in the Regular Army get now as compared with what she formerly got under the old law? Formerly she merely got six months' pay, and now after this war-risk insurance act has superseded the old law she gets $10,000 of insurance, and in addition to that she gets the regular compensation, and we are now asked to give them six months' pay extra. I think they are asking a little too much.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 4, noes 36.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That nothing in this act or in other existing legislation shall be construed as making the provisions of this act applicable to officers or enlisted men of any forces or troops of the Army of the United States other than those of the Regular Army, and nothing in this act shall be construed to apply in commissioned grades to any officers except those holding permanent or provisional appointments in the Regular Army.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the committee a question. Suppose this act is passed, and suppose a man who enlisted in the Regular Army after war was declared for the period of the war, would he be entitled to the benefits of this act?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is my understanding that only men who were regularly enlisted in the Regular Establishment would come under the provisions of the act. They enlisted for a term of years.

Mr. HULINGS. It came to my notice during the war that in the city of Pittsburgh the Eighteenth Regiment of the National Guard had an office for enlisting volunteers. There was also an enlistment office down town for the Regular Army. Surgeons of the regular service examining the men who applied for enlistment in the National Guard turned some of the men down, many of them, and they were told at the door by a Regular Army man that if they would go down town they could be enlisted in the Regular Army. Many of them did and were accepted. Does this bill make a distinction here and provide that those men who enlisted in the Eighteenth Regiment are not entitled to the benefits of the act, while those who enlisted in the Regular Army are entitled to the benefits of it?

Mr. ANTHONY. That distinction is made.

Mr. HULINGS. Does the gentleman realize that out of the seven divisions of the Regular Army sent to France five went to the front, and that at least half of them were men who volunteered after the war began, volunteers for the war period, drafted men, who were not one whit behind the Regulars in valor and efficiency? Does this bill cut all those men off? If that is the case I am against the bill because of this cruel discrimination, for while I think it is proper and all right to give this six months' pay to the wives and children of the Regulars, I do not think that the wives and children of men who served alongside the Regulars should be subject to such unjust discrimination.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. In view of the language on page 1, where the words "Regular Army" are specifically used, why have section 2? Is not that a matter of legislative tautology?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think section 2 is intended to clarify and make definite the fact that this is limited to men of the regular service.

Mr. LAYTON. Then why not have a third and fourth section to the same effect?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Delaware yield, so that I may ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to ask him a question along the line suggested by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] a few moments ago. I have in mind a man who was a sergeant, enlisted in the Regular Army, who has been for five or six years in the Army. He was a sergeant, and after the war had been running for some time he was taken out and put into a school for officers and made a first lieutenant, without application on his part, but by order of some of his superior officers. When he went into that establishment was he not taken out of the Regular Establishment?

Mr. ANTHONY. He accepted a commission in another establishment as a temporary officer.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The time he passes as a temporary or an emergency officer will count on the longevity in his reenlistment in the Regular service, and will count as a duration of service.

Mr. STEVENSON. But the minute that enlisted man in the Regular Army accepted a commission in the temporary Army he lost his status as a man in the regular service.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 2 of the bill. If the substantive portion of this bill, as provided in section 1, relates entirely and exclusively to officers and men on the active list of the Regular Army and on the retired list on active duty, it seems to me, as suggested by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON], that there is no necessity for section 2 of the bill. In other words, section 1 of the bill provides what shall be done with reference to this gratuity or compensation. It does not by any possible construction apply to any other class of men except those in the Regular Army, and I can not for the life of me see the necessity of adding another section saying that this bill shall not be construed as affecting the people of some other class.

I do not see any useful legislative purpose it serves. In view of the certainty of the restriction provided in section 1 it seems to me it is an entirely useless section and an encumbrance, and an unnecessary encumbrance upon the bill, and I think it ought to be stricken out.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. A while ago I wanted to refer to the treatment of the soldiers from another angle, and that is this. If we are going to pass this bill, this clause ought to be kept in here, because it makes definite what is to be done. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that we passed a bill last year to take care of the soldiers. In July we passed a measure providing that they should have preference in appointment to Federal offices. Now, what is the result? This city is full of men who are disabled, men who are able to fill the positions for which they apply—positions like watchmen, guards, elevator men, and all that. The appointment clerk of one of the largest divisions in the city told me just a day or two ago that they were unable to appoint any of those because the Civil Service Commission was standing between them and appointment and clamoring for the enforcement of the civil-service law, which requires every one of them to stand an examination and be certified in regular order from the civil-service list before he can be appointed to anything, and it has caused a great deal of trouble to the appointment officers and something should be done to relieve that situation.

I say, incidentally, when we called on a man to go through the firing line year before last we did not ask whether it was necessary or whether he could give the number of square feet in the Monument down here nor to tell you how far it was from Hongkong to Hawaii or any one of those things. He was simply asked if he was physically fit, and now when it comes to pass that we are going to provide apparently that he shall have the right to be appointed in preference to everybody else, he is confronted with the condition that he must take potluck along with everybody else who wants to stand the examination, and he can not get a position until he has stood such examination.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. I just want to ask the question whether the gentleman thinks his illustration has any relation whatever to this?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir; it has not; but it has a good deal of pertinency upon the treatment of the soldiers at large who come back here, many of them disabled, but are unable to secure any positions because of the fact that we have failed to enact legislation relieving them from the requirements. If they are to have preference, it should be made really effective by removing impossible requirements in many cases.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is not the preference after they have qualified for the position they seek? The illustration which the gentleman gave about ascertaining the number of square feet would not have any bearing upon that?

Mr. STEVENSON. Well, if he stands the examination he has to answer just such questions as that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly, because he has to qualify for the position he seeks and then he is given preference.

Mr. STEVENSON. All right. The gentleman approves this requirement then——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I think perhaps the committee might well consider whether it would be wise to strike out section 2. While on the face of it it seems merely a reiteration of the preceding section, it may possibly have the effect of an interpretation of that section in view of just such possibilities of construction of law as would let in the emergency, volunteer, and other forms of service, as is demonstrated by some of the views apparently held of this bill on the floor here this afternoon. For instance, I may call attention to this: There is sometimes a confusion in the popular mind as to whether the fact that a man has gone to service in a regular regiment did not constitute him a soldier in the same status as if he were originally a professional soldier who had enlisted under the terms of the law upon which enlistments in the regular and permanent Military Establishment were founded. For instance, in the national-defense act we provided that reserve officers shall be a part of the regular Military Establishment, but the officer is, as you will observe, a reserve officer. He is not called to constant professional duty and is not regarded as an officer on the active list. Yet it might be that hereafter some one, taking advantage of the present situation, would rule or hold somewhere that his occasional service in the Regular Army in peace times, as the national-defense act provides for, would constitute him within the meaning of this law as a professional or Regular Army officer whose widow would be entitled to receive these benefits.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman think the language of section 2, as a matter of fact, clarifies it or makes it more definite?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not. I submit my suggestion with all deference to the very plain statement of the gentleman from Alabama, thinking possibly that this reiteration of words is a limitation, not as a declaration of intent——

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the reiteration merely expresses the language of section 1.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand that in grammar, in form, and in fact, it is a reexpression; but being in a manner a limitation, I think possibly it serves as an interpretation.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion to strike out the last two words. The last two words are "Regular Army." It seems to me to be the purpose of the House to-day to strike out the "Regular Army." I want to make one or two brief observations on the attitude of the House. It seems to me the committee to-day is not very appreciative of our men in the Regular Army. I do not believe anybody can accuse me of being unfriendly to the Volunteers or to the National Guard. I was a private in the Volunteers during the Spanish War.

I was beaten for Congress three years ago because I was an officer in the National Guard at that time and in the Federal Military Service of the United States.

But it seems to me there is a question here which is not entirely a question of gratuity, and that is the moral question which is involved. I think we are violating what is at least an equitable contract between the United States and these men. When these men enlisted in the ranks or became officers in the Army, the law was that their families should get six months' pay in the event of their death. They had a right to rely on that as a part of their compensation. By repealing, inadvertently or otherwise, that provision, we are in effect depriving them of what was one of the inducements for their service. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] states that one of the reasons they are asking for this is that they must have lived extravagantly.

I would like to ask him how extravagantly a captain can live on $200 a month, a first lieutenant on $167 a month, or a second lieutenant on $141.61 a month? A captain receives $200 a month after 15 years of service, and you expect him to be married, live in a decent community, raise a family, bring his children up respectably and decently, send them to school, and clothe them properly. We expect him to do all this on less than a coal digger's wages, and then we take away this niggardly little part of his compensation, which he had a right to expect when he entered the service. I think we are committing a breach of faith with this man. You say his family gets the war-risk insurance. I am certainly not arguing that the war-risk insurance is too high. I am not arguing for any distinction between soldiers of one army and soldiers of another army, and I do not concede that this bill attempts to make any such distinction. Perhaps we could amend the war-risk insurance laws and make them more liberal, but this death benefit is merely a part of what the enlisted man and the officer in the Regular Army had a right to expect as part of their reward for faithful and poorly paid services. Their compensation under the war-risk insurance should in all fairness be in addition to that, and we should not deprive them of that little amount.

An officer in the Regular Army expects to spend his whole life in the service. You expect him to do that and you educate him for that. By that employment he is disqualified for other kinds of work. A man in the National Guard or in the National Army was engaged in other kinds of work when he went in. While in the National Guard he is still engaged in other kinds of work all the time, except when on active service. He is presumed to be earning good money in other capacities. He is not giving all of his time and services to his country.

And let me suggest this in fairness to the Regular: He has no vote here. He is nobody's constituent, because he does not acquire a voting residence anywhere. For that very reason the soldier of the Regular Army should be treated liberally, not grudgingly, by Congress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 48.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, on page 2, in lines 11 and 12, the words "or any other existing legislation."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WELLING: Page 2, lines 11 and 12, after the word "act," in line 11, strike out the words "or any other existing legislation."

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me perfectly obvious that that language ought not to be included in this bill. If anything has been added to other existing legislation, it was added affirmatively and consciously by the Congress. We know what we are providing for in section 1 of this bill, and of course we are justified in making any necessary limitation of section 1 in section 2, but surely our action to-day ought not to extend to other legislation that has been passed affecting these problems.

I am in favor of this bill. It has been framed to care for the dependents of certain Regular Army officers and enlisted men who, through no fault of their own, are deprived of benefits to which they are justly entitled and which they had reason to believe was a part of their compensation from the Government. I shall vote also, if given an opportunity so to do, to extend the same benefits to the families of all soldiers who died in the armies of the United States as well as those technically described in this bill as soldiers of the "Regular Army." The drafted men and the volunteers who gave their lives gave all any Regular Army man can give, and their dependents have the same claim upon this Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. WELLING].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the sum received hereunder shall be deducted from any amount that may be, or may become, due and payable to any such widow, child, children, or dependent relative of such officer or enlisted man under the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, or any act or acts amendatory thereof.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all of section 3.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that we have spent practically the whole day passing a bill which ought to have been one paragraph of the Army reorganization bill. The Committee on Military Affairs has been in session almost continuously since the 19th day of May, and they have labored in vain. We have not yet turned out a tentative draft of the Army reorganization bill.

The Republicans in this Congress announced that, inasmuch as they had a majority, in a little while they were going to do the things that the country needed done. And for many months we have had a neighbor that is so threatening in her attitude toward us it is almost certain that before many days we will enter into a war, and yet this Republican Congress, with a Republican majority of over 40 Members, for five or six months has been laboring in vain as far as doing anything to prepare our country and get us into a place where we can defend it properly in time of war.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; I do not care to yield. I have only five minutes.

I want to say this, that if the Republican Congress continues in its attitude toward the adoption of measures that are necessary for this country, as it has in its attitude toward the adoption of necessary military measures, they will long regret the position that they have taken. And the people of this country will show them in the coming November election that they are not in accord with the system of criticism that has been directed at the administration and which has so far borne such good political fruit.

For more than five years there has been a campaign of criticism on that side of the aisle, by which you have inflamed every class and character of people in our country, and in no instance have you adopted any plan of constructive legislation; in no case do you hold out any hope to anybody, except an opportunity to get even with some one who has not done some particular thing; and you hope to coordinate that, not because of any progressive act that you are attempting to do, but because you hope to be able to inflame the people and create enmity against the greatest Government on the face of the earth. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate, I think, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] should seek to inject a partisan question into almost every debate that occurs here on the merits of legislation. The criticism that he makes upon the House for not passing an Army appropriation bill is exceedingly unfortunate. The appropriation bill can not be considered until the estimates have been submitted.

Mr. CALDWELL. I said the Army reorganization bill.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman said "the appropriation bill"; at least, I so understood him. We can not consider the appropriation bill until the estimates have been made by the administration. Those estimates have just been submitted, and the Committee on Military Affairs will doubtless submit these matters to Congress as soon as they can.

Regarding the question of the Army reorganization bill, as the gentleman now says he intended to say, it might be suggested that the situation in Mexico would be a sufficient reason why the reorganization bill should not be considered until what we are going to do with Mexico shall be determined.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we on the Republican side ask, and have a right to ask, of the Democratic minority the same cooperation that we gave to them during the period of the war with regard to reconstruction and the bringing back of the country to a peace basis. The question is, Are you going to do it? Are you going on every available occasion to raise the partisan issue? Are you going to clamor against the efforts that are made on the part of the majority to bring the country back to a peace basis? We have the right to ask of you the same disinterested help and assistance in passing the Army reorganization act that we gave to you during the conduct of the war. The one is just as important as the other. There is, there should be, no politics in the consideration of such a measure.

The suggestion that the gentleman makes, that the Republican Party in any way is responsible for the unrest that now exists in the country, for the strikes, for the anti-American sentiments, for the efforts of men to discredit this country and this administration, is entirely unwarranted. I venture to say that there never has been a party under the circumstances that existed—there never has been a party in all our history so reluctant to criticize the President and the administration as the Republican Party has been during the war and since the war. We have had occasion enough certainly to criticize the partisan attitude of the administration, but these criticisms, because the Republican Party felt that it was not in the interest of the country, have been withheld for the sake of the country and its best interests. And so now at this time it is not justified on the part of the minority to make and raise these partisan issues when we should forget them in the necessity that arises to bring the country back to a peace basis and to legislate with justice and fairness to all the people of the country. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 41, noes 9.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report favorably to the House the bill as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH, as Speaker pro tempore, having assumed the chair, Mr. GOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 2497) to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relative of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read the third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman from Texas opposed to the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I am.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs, with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith, with the following amendments, to wit: On page 1, line 6, after the word "Army," insert a comma and the following: "National Guard or the Reserve in the service of the United States." On page 2, line 3, strike out the language "an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer and enlisted man at the date of his death," and insert in lieu thereof "the sum of $300." And on page 2, strike out all of section 2.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill. The motion to recommit is out of order for that reason. The same matter was ruled upon in Committee of the Whole, and it is very clear that under the precedents for many years, this bill being confined to officers and men of the Regular Army—a distinct class—it is not in order by way of amendment to insert other classes in the bill, as is proposed by the motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I admit that if the point of order is made it is good, and I ask unanimous consent to eliminate the first and third amendments, which would meet the objection of the gentleman from Illinois; to eliminate the first and third amendments and consider the second as the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes a point of order, which the Chair sustains. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to offer an amendment to his motion?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. I offer an amendment and ask the Clerk to strike out the first and third. I make a motion to recommit and ask the Clerk to eliminate the first and third amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLANTON moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: On page 2, line 3, strike out the words "an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer or enlisted man at the rate of his death" and insert in lieu thereof "the sum of $300."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, on that motion to recommit I ask for the yeas and nays, and pending that I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, December 4, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EUROPEAN OBLIGATIONS.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article by Frank H. Simonds, published in last evening's Star, containing the speech of the President, which I think has not yet been published, delivered at the peace conference, and which is illuminating, concerning the obligations that our country assumes in the future regarding the territorial settlements in Europe. I do not desire to comment on it at the present time, but at some time hereafter. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD, so that all Senators may see it.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SCOPE AND SPIRIT OF LEAGUE TOLD IN PRESIDENT'S SPEECH—ROUMANIA ASSURED AMERICAN ARMY AND FLEET MIGHT BE SENT OVERSEAS IF WORLD IS TROUBLED AGAIN.

[By Frank H. Simonds.]

"Many times during the discussion of the treaty of Versailles in the United States references have been made to the extent and character of the guaranties the United States would give by virtue of that document to various European nations.

"Of all the addresses of the President the most complete and impressive was that made on May 31 in a plenary session, when he laid down a doctrine which was declared by the members of the American delegation at the time to be one of the most important utterances of the whole conference, so far as American policy was concerned.

"The circumstances of the President's speech are of relatively minor importance. M. Bratiano and M. Trumbitch, representing Roumania and Serbia, had protested against the section in the treaty with Austria which compelled their countries to recognize the right of the four great powers to intervene on behalf of minorities in Roumania and Serbia. In point of fact, both countries refused to sign the treaty and have not yet signed it on this account; but what is interesting to the American public is the statement by the President of his conception of the extent to which American guaranties would go, once the treaty had been accepted. For my own part I have never seen anywhere so admirable and complete a definition of the President's views as to the scope and spirit of the league of nations.

PRESIDENT'S SPEECH IN FULL.

"Mr. Wilson's words were as follows:

"'I should be very sorry indeed if this session adjourned leaving in the mind of anyone the conviction that we have here expressed the idea that the great powers wish to impose their will upon the smaller nations, out of any feeling of pride or arrogance. I want to call attention to one aspect of this arrangement which we are working on together. We want to insure the peace of the world and to banish all elements of trouble and danger for the future. One of the essential conditions is an equitable distribution of territory in accordance with the desires and affinities of the populations.

"'This distribution made, the allied and associated powers will guarantee the maintenance of the conditions which we shall decide upon, having made those conditions as just as possible. These powers are the nations which will undertake the contract and the burdens; on them will rest the chief responsibility, just as, by force of circumstances, they have made the greatest effort during the war. And it is necessary always to remember that it is force which is the ultimate guaranty of the public peace.

ADVISERS, NOT DICTATORS.

"'Under such conditions is it unreasonable that we should say to you, speaking in the language not of dictators, but of advisers and of friends: 'We can not guarantee your frontiers here if we do not believe that they conform to certain principles of right and wrong?'

"'Exactly the same line of reasoning applies to the question of minorities. It is with the same concern that condition as to minorities has been discussed. If you want the principal allied and associated powers to guarantee the existence of your States, is it unreasonable that they should be satisfied as to conditions which they regard as indispensable, if we are to avoid future causes of war?

"'We ask our Roumanian and Serbian friends to believe that we have no desire this evening to invade ancient and recognized sovereignties. But the present treaty will add much, and it is impossible, for example, to treat the kingdom of the Serbs, the Croats, and the Slovenians as a unit created by the events which we have witnessed and at the same time, in certain contingencies, to treat the Serbian kingdom as a separate State.

"'If these States are solidly established, thanks to the treaty which we are making together, the right belongs to the powers which will guarantee the execution of this treaty, in the last analysis, to see to it that the conditions on which these States will be established are of a sort to insure the public peace. Our desire in this is not to interfere in any fashion which might injure these States in any particular, but to aid them and to help the common cause. We hope that you will not hesitate to accept our point of view, because we can not see another means of settling the question.

"'How could the Government of the United States go before the Congress and people of the United States and pretend that it had assisted in insuring the peace of the world, if it believed that the settlement agreed upon here contained unstable or dangerous elements?

AMERICA WOULD SEND ARMY AND FLEET.

"'If the world should be troubled again, if the conditions which we all regard as fundamental are challenged, the guaranties which will be given to you will pledge that the United States will send its Army and fleet across the ocean. Is it surprising, under such conditions, that it should desire to reach a solution of the various problems which seems to it satisfactory?

"'I would say to Mr. Bratiano, in particular, that we have not the smallest desire to impair the sovereignty of his country. We do not want to do anything that could displease him. Roumania will come out of this war increased in power and in territory. We have the right, accordingly, to insist on certain conditions which, in our opinion, will make this success permanent.

"'May I not ask my friend Mr. Kramar, my friend Mr. Trumbitch, and my friend Mr. Bratiano to believe that if we have only mentioned the great powers in the article which we have just been discussing, it is not because these powers desire to impose conditions of their own, but simply because they desire to satisfy themselves that they can guarantee the sum total of advantages which this treaty gives you as well as us with all the strength which they possess?

"'It is a question of working in common, and this collaboration can only be founded on a definite agreement. To leave the solution of these questions to later negotiations, as somebody has suggested, would amount to saying that when the conference had completed its labors some separate groups would decide among themselves what would in reality become a part of the general foundation of the peace of the world. This seems impossible.

FORCE ULTIMATE PEACE GUARANTY.

"'I hope that we shall reach—that is, our goal—a cordial and voluntary agreement to cooperate on the only basis possible. That basis, one must express it in this fashion, will have to be supplied by those who will furnish the force which will insure the maintenance of peace—by those in whom will dwell that force which will be the supreme guaranty of peace.

"'It is essential not to misunderstand the sense we attribute to the word "force." The United States has never had any aggressive purpose, and you all know the reasons for our intervention in the affairs of the Old World.

"'We pursue a common goal. All that we desire is to aid you in attaining that goal in accord with us. We only want to associate ourselves with you and we do not want to do anything which could run contrary to your interests.'

"Prime Minister Bratiano's reply, too long for quotation here, has not a little interest for Americans in view of the debate on the treaty in the United States Senate. In substance, he declared that Roumania was willing to agree to any arrangement vesting the league of nations with the right to intervene in all countries, big and little, on behalf of minorities, but unwilling to permit four great powers to arrogate to themselves the right to intervene in the case of small countries.

WHY IDEA WAS REJECTED.

"The effect of such a provision, however, would have been to authorize the league of nations to intervene on behalf of the negro in the case of the United States, on behalf of the Irish in the case of Great Britain, and in the interests of the German and Slav minorities in the case of Italy. Therefore it was promptly rejected. Roumania and Serbia thereupon refused to sign the treaty with Austria, and Roumania withdrew from the peace conference and later invaded Hungary and annexed Bessarabia.

"But it will be noted that the basis of Roumanian and Serbian action was apprehension of interference in their own domestic affairs and the loss of national independence, together with a protest against the discrimination against small States. As I have said before, however, for Americans the chief interest is the incident in the speech of the President, which clearly discloses his idea of the scope of guaranties to be given by the United States as well as the three other great powers to all the countries of eastern and southern Europe." ESTIMATES AND APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I present for printing in the RECORD a condensed report of the estimates from the various departments of the Government for the coming fiscal year of 1921. These estimates are more than surprising; they seem to me to be absolutely startling.

The estimates for the regular annual supply bills and the permanent annual appropriations exceed the appropriations of last year, when we were at the finish of the war, by nearly a half billion dollars. The estimate for every one of the 13 appropriation bills, excepting the Post Office and Naval bills, is in excess of the appropriations for 1920. The estimate for the Post Office appropriation bill is less by something over $200,000,000, and the estimate for the naval appropriation bill is less than that of a year ago by $43,000,000, but as to the other bills the estimates are appreciably increased all the way through.

Mr. President, we, of course, know that we have a growing country and that we have had a war; but looking back of the Fifty-second Congress—in fact, to the Fifty-first Congress—our appropriations before that time had been running from a half billion to three-quarters of a billion dollars in each of two years, or in an entire Congress. We all remember the saying of Speaker Reed—in fact, it became a household phrase—that though we had a billion-dollar Congress—in the Fifty-first Congress—we also had a billion-dollar country, because the expenditures for the two fiscal years 1891 and 1892 amounted to a trifle over a billion dollars, but each of the following Congresses expended less than did the Fifty-first.

The permanent appropriations, those that we must provide for each year without going through the formality of appropriating through our annual appropriation bills, a policy which I earnestly condemn, amount to about a billion and a half dollars. They amounted last year to nearly $2,000,000,000. Mr. President, such appppropriations are constantly being added to by incorporating in the various bills clauses to the effect that the money is to be paid annually for so many years, or every year hereafter, as, for instance, in the case of the appropriations made for vocational education and those old appropriations heretofore made for agricultural universities and colleges, and so forth; and now comes the interest upon our bonds and certificates, which must be paid in the way of permanent annual appropriations, the amount of which rises and falls with the fluctuation of our indebtedness.

Going back to the time of which I speak, the first billion-dollar Congress, we were able to reduce appropriations after the Fifty-first Congress in the following Congresses continuing up to the Spanish-American War, when the appropriations rose to a billion and a half dollars in the two years. Finally, in the Sixtieth Congress the appropriations reached an amount somewhat in excess of $2,000,000,000. Then after the Sixtieth Congress each Congress cost us approximately $2,000,000,000, or $1,000,000,000 annually up to the World War.

Mr. President, with the burden of taxes we are carrying and with the World War now behind us, it seems to me——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Wyoming give us the estimates for the year immediately preceding the war?

Mr. WARREN. I do not happen to have them here, but for a Congress they amounted to something like a billion dollars a year—sometimes a trifle over and sometimes a trifle under that figure. Now, we have expenditures at the rate of a billion and one-half dollars a year for permanent appropriations, and we are asked to appropriate this year, in addition to that, almost $4,000,000,000, and added to this come deficiency and miscellaneous amounts, which may amount to billions. In fact, those in 1920 amounted to over $2,250,000,000. So we are now asked to appropriate nearly fourteen times as much as we were appropriating when this country became so startled on the announcement that there had been a billion-dollar Congress.

It seems to me that the time has come when we should shut the gate entirely to new requisitions and pause and consider whether we want to continue building up departments and commissions and the like of that. Of course, I do not need to say that the duties of the Appropriations Committees of the Houses of Congress are to appropriate the money called for by the laws which Congress passes; so it is out of the power of those committees to regulate entirely the expenses of the country; in fact, they have very little to do with that; but the laws enacted from day to day, I may say, various thoughtless measures, resolutions, and so forth, calling for investigations and for similar objects, call for great amounts.

Mr. President, I ask that this statement may go into the RECORD in the shape in which it is prepared.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Wyoming if he will read the estimates for the Army.

Mr. WARREN. I have here the estimates for the Army.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the Senator also read the estimates for the Navy.

Mr. WARREN. I also have the estimates for the Navy.

The estimates for the Army are $982,800,020; those for fortifications are $117,793,330. The Navy asks for $573,131,254.80, which is less than the expenditure last year. That is one of the two departments the estimates for which are less than the expenditures of last year, but only to the amount of a little less than $43,000,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the estimates for the Army. As the Senator from Wyoming has just said, the estimate for the Army for 1921 is $982,000,000 in round figures, while the appropriations for the current fiscal year of 1920 were $772,000,000, showing an increase, in round figures, of $200,000,000. I took occasion day before yesterday to examine the estimates for the Military Establishment in some detail, and I saw in the estimate that the item "Pay of the Army" is increased about $112,000,000 over the appropriations for the current fiscal year, from which I gather that the estimate of $982,000,000 is for an Army of 500,000. May I assure the Senator from Wyoming that not with my consent will we have a Regular Army of 500,000 men.

Mr. WARREN. I will say, Mr. President, doubtless that is true. However, there is nothing in this estimate calculated on its face to provide for an increase in salaries or wages. While we have a commission or committees that are supposed to report very soon upon the question of raising the wages, salaries, and so forth, of something like 110,000 employees, there is nothing in this estimate that covers that expectation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, through the courtesy of the Senator from Wyoming I received in the morning mail a copy of the statement which he has just put in the RECORD, and it occurred to me that the increases demanded by the Agricultural and other departments were largely due to the increased cost of the civil service. The Senator, of course, knows we have very materially advanced the salaries of employees by giving them bonuses, and in all probability we will again increase that item of annual expenditure. Can the Senator inform the Senate in round figures what the approximate amount of increase is due to that legislation?

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator mean for last year?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. The document is a comparison of appropriations for 1920 and estimates for 1921. Now, can the Senator say what proportion of the increase is due to the increased wage of the civil-service employees?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that I have not at this moment here at hand the figures the Senator asks for.

Mr. THOMAS. It is a very considerable part of it, I assume.

Mr. WARREN. It is quite a considerable, although not very large, proportion of the total sum. Of course, as the Senator knows, we granted to the employees of the Government a bonus of $240 a year for 1920; for 1919 a bonus of $120 a year.

Mr. THOMAS. We have a very large army of employees, and of course any increase, however small per capita, aggregates a very large sum of money.

Mr. WARREN. Two hundred and forty dollars a year multiplied by 100,000 would aggregate a considerable sum.

Mr. THOMAS. Should it not be multiplied by considerably more than 100,000?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; the increase would be considerable so far as the bonus is concerned; but we have not in the last appropriation bills raised many regular salaries.

Mr. THOMAS. We have raised some of them.

Mr. WARREN. Very few of them have been raised.

Mr. THOMAS. Some of them, I think a good many, were raised in 1918. Of course, the appropriation bills which were enacted by the present Congress because of the failure of the last Congress to enact them would only reflect the increases that were granted at that time and which are covered in the legislation of this Congress; they would not reflect the increases included in legislation of former Congresses.

Mr. WARREN. The increase in regular salaries was not great either in 1918 or 1919 so far as appropriations are concerned that were within the province of the Appropriations Committees. As the Senator knows, there were a great many lump-sum appropriations for this commission and that commission or bureau, and included in the legislation relating to such commissions or bureaus was the authority given to them to employ assistants, and of course they arranged the salaries of the assistants employed by them.

Mr. THOMAS. But if Congress complies with the requirements of the estimates now submitted and appropriates practically $5,000,000,000, then the legislation appropriating money for other purposes will be in excess of the $5,000,000,000, will it not?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes; and the expectations of employees relative to advance of salaries and wages are very great. The 1921 estimates do not provide for increases.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that two years ago when the bonus was $120 to each employee of the Government outside of the Post Office Department the amount required was approximately $28,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS. And that bonus was doubled.

Mr. SMOOT. The bonus was doubled, so that approximately $56,000,000 would be required to meet the $240 bonus paid for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. In answer to the Senator about our appropriating approximately $5,000,000,000 for the fiscal year 1921, I will assure the Senate—and I want the country to know—that we are not going to appropriate that amount of money. If there is strength enough in some of the Senators here to talk to death such tremendous proposed appropriations, we are going to do it; we are not going to appropriate any such amount of money.

Mr. THOMAS. I venture the prediction that before we get through appropriating money in this Congress we will greatly exceed $5,000,000,000 a year.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. THOMAS. In a moment. I am very confident, although I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, that my prediction will be verified.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will remember that when I made the prediction here nearly a year ago that the expenditures of the Government for the fiscal year 1921 would be $4,000,000,000 the Secretary of the Treasury "went up in the air," and he and many others throughout the country thought I was crazy.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator was not crazy—not as much so as he is now, when he assumes that he is going to hold our appropriations down to $5,000,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. May I say a word right there?

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment. For example, this Congress will give a bonus of $240 to the soldiers forming our last Army. That will be due to the fact that they will demand it, on the one hand, and to the fact that both parties are equally anxious to secure their good will, on the other, and that item alone will amount to somewhere in the neighborhood of three-quarters of a billion dollars. When to that are added the other demands that will inevitably be made upon us, and particularly if serious trouble eventuates with Mexico—which seems to me, from what I know about it, to be unavoidable unless the Mexican administration shall assume a different tone toward this Government—we shall be very lucky, indeed, if we do not exceed the estimates to which the Senator has called attention.

Mr. SMOOT. If we get into a war, that is another question.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I want to say, if the Senator will excuse me for a moment——

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the Senator for permitting this interruption. I shall not detain him longer.

Mr. WARREN. During the last year we have had deficiency appropriations amounting to over $1,141,000,000. We had miscellaneous expenses amounting to $1,126,000,000. In other words, two and a half billion dollars were added to the regular and permanent estimates.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WARREN. Let me finish, please. Now, undoubtedly there will have to be added, as there always have been added, more or less items that fall short during the year and come in in the way of deficiencies.

I want to finish this statement, if the Senator will allow me a moment.

As nearly as we can estimate the revenues of the coming year, they will amount to five billion six hundred and twenty millions plus. The revenues from the Postal Service are estimated to be something over $415,000,000, or a total of over $6,000,000,000 in revenue, while the regular estimated appropriations amount to some $1,170,000,000 less than that sum; but miscellaneous items, deficiencies, increase of wages and salaries, and so forth, will far more than absorb this estimated excess.

One word more, and that is in relation to the promise of my colleague, which I hope we shall be able to fulfill, that these estimates will be greatly cut down. I want to say, however, that it is very largely in the hands of the Senate and not in the hands of the committee as to what we have to appropriate. It is idle to stand here and threaten what we will do when we know we can not do it. What we have got to do, if we do our duty, is to appropriate the money which Congress provides that we shall appropriate by law; and I think the necessity of taking this matter up and promising ourselves what we will do toward economy, toward cutting down these estimates, should be taken to heart by every Member of the Senate and it should be kept in mind in all bills that he introduces and supports here.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I was going to say to the Senator, who is the very able chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that these estimates sent down here are sent down in obedience to law, and the estimates are made upon the laws that Congress itself has passed; and, therefore, who is responsible for this great total of estimates except Congress itself?

I do not exactly understand why the Senator has injected this matter in here now. I have never known it to be done before. The estimates are sent down here regularly, and sent to the Senator's committee; and his committee, of which I am a member and of which he is the able chairman, will consider all these matters, and it is for the committee to determine whether we shall report out from our committee these appropriations. We will have to appropriate that which Congress has provided for, and the matter of new appropriations must be considered by our committee; and when we report them out the responsibility is on the Senate or the House, on Congress, and not upon the heads of the departments who send these estimates here. They are compelled to send them. Sometimes they exceed what we give them, and we frequently refuse the estimate, as the Senator knows; but the heads of these departments are sending these estimates in obedience to the laws of Congress.

Now, here is the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I agree with him that we are not appropriating the money that is estimated for; but that is based upon a recommendation made to Congress, I suppose, from the General Staff. I will ask the Senator if that is not the case. Have they not recommended an increase in the Army which would carry this appropriation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The War Department made the recommendation. I would not say it was the General Staff that made it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, the War Department. Of course we do not have to appropriate this sum of money, and probably we will not appropriate this sum of money; and I will join with the Senator from Utah in cutting down these appropriations where Congress has not made provision for the appropriations; but where it has what can we do except carry out the law?

After all, the responsibility is on Congress, on the House and on the Senate; and I think it wise that the Senator from Wyoming should warn the Senate as to future appropriations. The great appropriations asked for here are asked in obedience to the laws that we have passed, and we go helter-skelter sometimes and appropriate money here without considering the total amount. "What is $1,000,000 or what is $500,000"—and we all vote for it, knowing that when the sum total comes it will mount up into the billions of dollars. Therefore I think the Senator from Wyoming is doing right in warning the Senate in regard to future bills making appropriations. I do not know what the appropriation bills are going to amount to. It may be that we will have war, and then the Senator from Utah will have to take back what he says about reducing the appropriations below $5,000,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not take it back unless there is war.

Mr. OVERMAN. Unless there is war; I will stand with him on it, and, as he says, if necessary, filibuster on it.

Mr. BORAH. We can not have a filibuster. We are going to adopt cloture.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, no; I will never cast my vote to adopt cloture.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have been very much interested in what the Senator from Wyoming has stated about these appropriations, and especially in his statements about the appropriations for the Army. I happen to be a member of that committee. I am delighted to hear the statements made by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] on that subject. The idea of this country appropriating $985,000,000 for the Army two years after the war has closed during a time of peace, with millions of trained soldiers in our country easily available, is, to my mind, the height of unrighteousness. I do not see how we can afford even to think of such a Military Establishment as that in times of peace, and I will join the Senators from New York and Wyoming in fighting any such Military Establishment. I was glad to hear the Senator from New York say that he would not support an Army of 500,000 men in time of peace. I would like to cut that figure at least in two, and perhaps then reduce it still further. I think some of our people are going military mad, and going military mad at the wrong time. Of course, if we have war, that is another subject; we will deal with that subject when we get to it; but the appropriations asked for by the department at this time are on a peace basis, as I understand.

They are asking for $985,000,000, and then more than $117,000,000 extra for fortifications, which fortification bill does not come before our committee, making more than $1,000,000,000 for the Army. That can not be defended by anyone, and I certainly join the Senator from New York in opposing it. I notice that the estimate asks for $6,778,000 for the Military Academy next year. We appropriated $2,277,000 for the academy this year. Here is an increase of over four and a half million. There is no possible excuse for such a recommendation. Unless we have war with Mexico or some other power, we should cut down the appropriations asked for by our Military Establishment from one billion one hundred and six million to a sum not exceeding four hundred million, thus saving to the American taxpayers more than $700,000,000 over the sum asked for by the department. The appropriation of the sums asked for by the Military Establishment would be largely a useless waste of the people's money. If other recommendations of the departments are like those of the Military Establishment it is indeed well that the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee has called the Senate's attention to the matter.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it is true that such comparative tables have not always been introduced for printing in the RECORD at the commencement of Congress—perhaps never before—but I want them introduced now in this condensed form, and I want the RECORD to show plainly, and in large, plain type, this statement exactly as it has been compiled.

While the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] says that these estimates are sent in as it becomes the duty of the Secretaries, and that is true, nevertheless in these estimates come a great many thing that are not specially asked for, and we do expect, as the Senator has said, to trim those, and to trim them without mercy; but, on the other hand, as he has so justly said, we are in the hands of Congress in passing the bills that it does pass.

Mr. President, I send this statement to the desk and ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Table comparing by bills estimates of regular annual appropriations for the fiscal year 1921 with the appropriations made for the fiscal year 1920, during the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress and the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

(Prepared by the clerks to the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House December 3, 1919.)

The column of 1920 appropriations does not include the sums carried for that fiscal year in deficiency and miscellaneous appropriation acts for similar purposes.

The estimated appropriations for 1921 will be found in detail in the annual Book of Estimates, House Document No. 411, transmitted to Congress on December 1, 1919, and the estimated revenues for 1921 in the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1919.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word on this subject. I can not agree with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] that all of these estimates made are based upon the laws passed by Congress. It is true that the permanent appropriations that are made must be reported as Congress has provided.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I just want to correct the Senator there. I said the estimates were made upon the provisions of the laws, or laws anticipated, that were recommended by the departments, which we could pass or not, and it is up to Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I misunderstood the Senator's statement, if he made that qualification. We know that the estimates are made under the law to-day, but I doubt whether there is one departmental head who ever takes the time to study in detail the estimates that he asks the Secretary of the Treasury to send to Congress. These estimates are made by the heads of divisions, by the heads of bureaus, and they are figured in such a way that they will cover not only all the expenses at the time that the estimate is made but every contingency that can possibly be thought of, and then a percentage is added for the increased activities and the number of employees that they would like to have in the bureau or division. That is where the trouble comes; and I have said time and time again that as long as Congress will appropriate the money we will have an everlastingly increasing number of employees in the Government.

Take the employees in the District of Columbia for the month of October. The armistice has been signed for over a year. Was there any decrease in the employees in October last? No. Instead there was an increase of 370; and every month, with the exception of two, since I have asked to be furnished with a statement on the first of the month as to the number of employees of the Government in the District of Columbia, it has shown an increase; and when will it stop? Never, as long as we appropriate the money.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I think there is another reason which prevents the reduction of the civil-service force, and that is Congress, or, rather, the individual Members of the two Houses. The Senator will correct me if I am wrong, because he knows, but I was informed that a reduction was made, or proposed to be made, in one of the departments some time ago.

Mr. SMOOT. In the War Department.

Mr. THOMAS. A reduction of 500 employees, and within 24 hours 169 protests, personal and by letter, were lodged by Members of both Houses of Congress against the reduction, as affecting certain of their constituents, with the result that the movement was aborted and paralyzed, and then abandoned. Is that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct. There were 169 protests within 24 hours.

Mr. THOMAS. One can imagine the number of protests that would have been made if the reduction had been 5,000 instead of 500.

Mr. KING. Will my colleague yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Colorado must be mistaken, because the salaries that are paid to Government employees are so small no one wants to serve the Government, and they are all resigning.

Mr. SMOOT. They are all loyal, we know, to the Government.

Mr. President, there is no doubt that we can abolish the War Risk Bureau and save the employment of 8,000 to 9,000 persons in the District of Columbia, and serve every interest better than it is being served to-day.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, does not the Senator mean that we ought to do it? He says we can do it. I doubt very much whether we can do it, for the reasons embodied in my last interruption.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps the Senator from Colorado is right; but I do not want to believe it, Mr. President, until I see Congress refuse to do it after the information is presented to Congress, and that information is going to be presented to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senator if it is not true that one of the great evils in the appropriation bills is that which he and I both for 15 years have been fighting against, and that is the lump-sum appropriations. When you make a lump-sum appropriation there is no restriction on it, and they can employ as many clerks as they want. Congress should go to work and investigate this matter, and say how many clerks they could have and what salary they should receive instead of making a lump-sum appropriation and giving the discretion to the head of the department to employ whom he pleases and pay whatever he wants to pay. That is where the evil lies, I think.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not any doubt, Mr. President, that from that source comes the greatest evil. Before the war we were cutting such appropriations out just as fast as we could, but when the war came lump-sum appropriations became the universal practice, and what has been the result? I can point to-day, Mr. President, to young men being paid $10,000 a year, and if an investigation is made I say now that it will be found that they never earned more than $2,000 in any preceding year.

I had a delegation of ladies from the War Risk Bureau the other day come into my office, after it was announced that I had a program to abolish the War Risk Bureau, and the question arose as to whether it was right to do it. They had sacrificed—oh, how much they had sacrificed—to come here and work for the Government. They could go anywhere and get more money than the Government was paying them. I asked the lady who was the spokesman, "What are you paid?" She replied that she was receiving $1,800 and the $240 bonus. I asked her where she was from, and I am not going to name the State; but I say now, Mr. President, that neither she nor any other girl can get that amount of salary in the town from which she came. I asked her if that was not the case, and she said, "Well, I could go to New York and get it." I said, "For God's sake, go."

Mr. President, I want to say that the whole financial situation is in such a chaotic condition that unless Congress takes hold of it and grapples with it serious trouble is ahead. It seems no one is thinking of the Treasury of the United States and how the bills are to be paid. Let Senators join and call a halt.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not wish to appear presumptuous, but I must ask for the regular order. There is some morning business that we want to transact. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are in order.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a resolution adopted by the American Legion post, of Hoquiam, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the deportation of certain aliens, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the State and county chairmen of the Loyal League of the State of Washington, praying for a reprint and general distribution of that part of Senate Document No. 61 relating to Bolshevism, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions from the United Textile Workers of America, Local Union No. 671, of Willimantic; of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, Local Union No. 79 of New Haven; of the International Association of Machinists, Lodge No. 313, of Waterbury; of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Local Union No. 43, of Hartford; and of the Cigarmakers' International Union of America, Local Union No. 282, of Bridgeport, all in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against the passage of the antistrike clause in the so-called Cummins railroad bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Windsor Locks, Conn., praying for the adoption of the treaty of peace and the league of nations covenant, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Elias Howe, jr., Post, No. 3, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Connecticut, of Bridgeport, Conn., praying for the passage of the so-called Fuller bill, providing for increase in pensions to the veterans of the Civil War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Common Council of New Britain, Conn., praying for the continuation of the daylight-saving law, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the International Association of Machinists, Lodge No. 1399, of Stonington, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for an extension of Government control of railroads for a period of two years, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 3486) to provide compensation in lieu of taxes to the several States with respect to certain public lands within their borders; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 3487) for the relief of Clarence L. Reames; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 3488) to provide for a site and public building at Fort Myers, Fla.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

SEDITIOUS ACTS AND UTTERANCES.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill S. 3317, a bill to prohibit and punish certain seditious acts against the Government of the United States and to prohibit the use of the mails for the purpose of promoting such acts, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MILITARY POLICY.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have here the report of the committee on military policy of the American Legion which was submitted at the national convention of that organization at Minneapolis a short time ago with reference to the military policy that should be followed by this country. I understand it was adopted, and it states very clearly and very concisely the ideas of that body of men, fresh from the battle fields of Europe, as to the policy this country should adopt. I think it ought to be printed in the RECORD, and I ask that that may be done, and that it may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the report was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY POLICY.

"Your committee on military policy met at the Minneapolis Club at 3.30 p. m. Monday, November 10, 1919, and chose as its chairman Mr. L. V. Patch, of Idaho, and as its secretary Mr. B. W. Eddy, of Louisiana.

"It was agreed to confine the committee's thought and action to statements of policy rather than statements of detail. The following resolutions were adopted:

"1. That a large standing army is uneconomic and un-American. National safety with freedom from militarism is best assured by a national citizen army based on the democratic and American principles of the quality of obligation and opportunity for all.

"2. We favor a policy of universal military training, and that the administration of such policy shall be removed from the complete control of any exclusively military organization or caste.

"3. We are strongly opposed to compulsory military service in time of peace.

"4. We have had a bitter experience in the cost of unpreparedness for national defense and the lack of proper training on the part of officers and men, and we realize the necessity of an immediate revision of our military system and a thorough housecleaning of the inefficient officers and methods of our entire Military Establishment.

"We favor a national military system based on universal military obligation, to include a relatively small Regular Army and a citizen army capable of rapid expansion sufficient to meet any national emergency, on a plan which will provide competitive and progressive training for all officers, both of the Regular Army and of the citizen forces.

"We believe that such military system should be subject to civil authority.

"Any legislation tending toward an enlarged and stronger military caste we unqualifiedly condemn.

"5. The national citizen army which should and must be the chief reliance of this country in time of war should be officered by men from its own ranks and administered by a general staff on which citizen-soldier officers and Regular Army officers shall serve in equal number.

"We recommend that Congress pass such legislation as will make the United States Air Service a separate and distinct department of our system of national defenses under control of a member of the President's Cabinet appointed for that purpose alone.

"6. We favor the continuance of training camps for the training and education of officers to serve in case of national requirement.

"We recommend that military training in high schools and colleges be encouraged.

"7. The national citizen army should be organized into corps, divisions, and smaller units, composed in each case of officers and men who come from the same State or locality, and preserving local designations as far as practicable.

"8. The national citizen army should be trained, equipped, officered, and assigned to definite units before, rather than after, the commencement of hostilities.

"9. The selection and training of men for the national citizen army should be under the local control and administration of its own officers, subject to general national regulations.

"10. That a committee of seven be appointed by the examining committee of the American Legion to consult with and advise the Military Committees of both Houses of Congress as to the working out of the details of organization and training of the future Army and Navy of the United States, using as its basis the resolutions accepted and adopted by this convention."

THE OIL FLOTATION SITUATION.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have received the resolution introduced and passed by the American Mining Congress, which recently met in St. Louis, together with an address in support of it before the Federal Trade Commission by Hon. George L. Nye, of the Kansas bar. I ask leave to have it referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view to having it printed as a Senate public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPORT OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by the act of Congress to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States, approved January 16, 1883, I transmit herewith the Thirty-sixth Annual Report of the United States Civil Service Commission for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1919.

RELIEF OF NEEDY PEOPLES IN EUROPE (H. DOC. NO. 449).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by the act of Congress, approved February 25, 1919, I transmit herewith a preliminary report on the receipts and expenditures made under appropriation of that act.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 161).

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I present the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon Senate bill 2472, to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act. If there is no objection, I would like to have the report acted upon as soon as possible.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that I have any objection, but I do not know what the report is.

Mr. McLEAN. It is a report of the conference committee on Senate bill 2472.

Mr. BORAH. I know; but we do not know what the report is. I know what it is about.

Mr. McLEAN. The House report is printed, and the Senate report is a duplicate of the House report.

Mr. SMOOT. I just want to ask the Senator one question, and I base it upon the interest that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] has in the bill. In the conference report do you eliminate the double liability of stockholders?

Mr. McLEAN. I will say to the Senator that the report seems to be rather formidable in the number of amendments, but nearly all of them are House amendments, and their purpose is to throw added restrictions around the bill and on the whole improve it and safeguard it. There were four amendments about which there was some controversy—Nos. 1, 4, 17, and 29.

The first amendment eliminates the word "principally" in the first section, which was stricken out at the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. That was put back by the House, but in conference the House receded, so that the bill stands in that regard as it passed the Senate.

The next amendment, numbered 4, relates to the use of the word "Federal," which the Senate committee did not think advisable, and the House receded therefrom.

The next amendment was No. 17, which provided that these banking corporations might establish agencies in the United States. The Senate committee objected to that, and the House receded.

The amendment from which the Senate receded was No. 29, which applies to the double liability of stockholders, and on that amendment the Senate receded for good reasons, as it seems to me.

The House changed the language so as to clearly define and limit the deposits. The business of these institutions, as the Senator knows, is restricted to foreign and international transactions, and it seemed to the committee that if we imposed a double liability under the circumstances the law would be inoperative, because the 9 or 10 State institutions which are organized for this purpose have no double liability. The New York State law, as the Senator knows, does impose a double liability upon all the trust companies and banks in that State, but not upon these finance corporations.

The Senator knows that the national banks are permitted to invest 10 per cent of their capital and surplus in these institutions. That creates a contingent liability upon the part of the national banks which is utterly impossible to estimate unless you put it in at par; consequently, you add a liability to the national banks which might impair their capital.

Mr. KING. I understand the conference report has just been submitted.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; but the reports of the two Houses are duplicates. The House report is printed and at the service of the Senate.

Mr. KING. But we have had no opportunity to examine it. Would the Senator object to having it go over until to-morrow morning?

Mr. McLEAN. I think the only question in controversy is the question of double liability.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, and he is unavoidably detained from the Senate. I do know he is interested in this question and desired to be heard upon it when the report came in. Therefore I am going to ask that it go over this morning.

Mr. McLEAN. I will say to the Senator from Utah that I understand the Senator from North Dakota may not return to the Senate for a month, and I think he would have made a request of me if he had desired to have consideration of the report postponed. I know that in his opinion the bill has been greatly improved, and while I would like to accommodate the Senator from North Dakota, and if he had made the request of the Senator from Utah I would be willing that it should go over for a day or two, I think he would have made a request of me if he had wanted it to go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Senator from Connecticut to get the idea that the Senator from North Dakota asked me that the report should go over. He did tell me, however, that the conferees on the part of the Senate had yielded, that the double liability went out of the bill, and that he desired to be heard upon that question when the conference report came before the Senate. I do not know how long the Senator is going to remain away, and all I will ask to-day is that the report may go over until to-morrow morning, and I will find out in the meantime just when the Senator from North Dakota will return, and also whether he desires anything said about it.

Mr. McLEAN. I ask that the report may be printed in the RECORD, and I give notice now that I will call the matter up to-morrow.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments numbered 1, 4, and 17.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 18, 20, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, and 35, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 14, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: After the word "such" in said amendment insert the words "general conditions as to security and such"; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "herein" insert a new sentence as follows: "Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to prohibit the Federal Reserve Board, under its power to prescribe rules and regulations, from limiting the aggregate amount of liabilities of any or all classes incurred by the corporation and outstanding at any one time"; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the words "United States" insert the words "authorized by this section"; also strike out the figure "5" and insert "10"; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the amendment except the word "but" and insert the following: "not engaged in the general business of buying or selling goods, wares, merchandise or commodities in the United States, and not"; also after the word "transacting" insert the word "any" and strike out the comma after the words "United States" and before the word "except"; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 21, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: The words "except in a corporation engaged in the business of banking, when 15 per cent of its capital and surplus may be invested," stricken out by the House, to be retained in the bill; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "they" and insert in lieu thereof the words "it either directly or indirectly"; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 36, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Strike out the proviso at the end of the first paragraph, and insert a period after the word "corporations"; in the first line of the third paragraph insert after the word "institution" the words "principally engaged in foreign business"; and the House agree to the same.

LOSSES SUFFERED BY AMERICANS IN MEXICO.

Mr. KING. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 130) proposing a plan for the adjustment of claims made by citizens of the United States for indemnification for losses suffered in Mexico, not otherwise redressed, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 130) proposing a plan for the adjustment of claims made by citizens of the United States for indemnification for losses suffered in Mexico, not otherwise redressed.

Whereas citizens of the United States residing in and having property in Mexico have been caused by the delinquency of the Mexican Government to suffer great and untold damages on account of murders, personal outrages, larcenies, arsons, trespasses to property, and dispossession of lands, as well as arbitrary confiscations under the guise of law through a long period of years without cessation or redress; and

Whereas claims against the Government of Mexico on account of such wrongs have from time to time been filed with the Department of State for presentation to the Government of Mexico; and

Whereas no progress is being made toward the liquidation, settlement, and satisfaction of such claims: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is requested to open negotiations with the Government of Mexico proposing the appointment of a joint high commission on the part of Mexico and on the part of the United States, which shall be authorized to receive, consider, liquidate, settle, and adjust outstanding claims made by citizens of the United States for indemnification for losses suffered in Mexico which have not otherwise been redressed.

SEC. 2. That in the event the Government of Mexico is unwilling to proceed with the appointment of such joint high commission, the President is hereby authorized to appoint a commission consisting of 11 persons, which shall include officers of the Army and persons from civil life, who are hereby empowered, upon the part of the United States, to receive, consider, liquidate, settle, ascertain, and find the damages suffered severally by citizens of the United States on account of wrongs and trespasses committed against the persons and property of such citizens in Mexico and which have not been otherwise redressed.

SEC. 3. That upon the ascertainment and determination of such damages as aforesaid the President is hereby authorized to employ the naval and military forces of the United States and to take such measures as may be necessary to accomplish the payment and satisfaction of such claims.

Mr. KING. In this connection I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a number of extracts from annual messages and a special message delivered to Congress by President Andrew Jackson, calling attention to the wrongs to which American citizens were subjected in his time and anterior thereto. I do this for the purpose of indicating that the situation in Mexico is not an acute one now, that it is chronic, and that for nearly a century American citizens have been subjected to the same wrongs and indignities by the Government of Mexico that they have been subjected to during the past few years. I ask that the excerpts may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the seventh annual message of President Jackson, Dec. 7, 1835.]

"Unfortunately many of the nations of this hemisphere are still self-tormented by domestic dissensions. Revolution succeeds revolution; injuries are committed upon foreigners engaged in lawful pursuits; much time elapses before a government sufficiently stable is erected to justify expectation of redress; ministers are sent and received, and before the discussions of past injuries are fairly begun fresh troubles arise; but too frequently new injuries are added to the old, to be discussed together with the existing government after it has proved its ability to sustain the assaults made upon it, or with its successor if overthrown. If this unhappy condition of things continues much longer, other nations will be under the painful necessity of deciding whether justice to their suffering citizens does not require a prompt redress of injuries by their own power, without waiting for the establishment of a government competent and enduring enough to discuss and to make satisfaction for them."

[From the eighth annual message of President Jackson, Dec. 5, 1836.]

"* * * You will perceive by the accompanying documents that the extraordinary mission from Mexico has been terminated on the sole ground that the obligations of this Government to itself and to Mexico, under treaty stipulations, have compelled me to trust a discretionary authority to a high officer of our Army to advance into territory claimed as part of Texas if necessary to protect our own or the neighboring frontier from Indian depredation. In the opinion of the Mexican functionary who has just left us, the honor of his country will be wounded by American soldiers entering, with the most amicable avowed purposes, upon ground from which the followers of his Government have been expelled, and over which there is at present no certainty of a serious effort on its part being made to reestablish its dominion. * * *

"In the meantime the ancient complaints of injustice made on behalf of our citizens are disregarded, and new causes of dissatisfaction have arisen, some of them of a character requiring prompt remonstrance and ample and immediate redress. I trust, however, by tempering firmness with courtesy and acting with great forbearance upon every incident that has occurred or that may happen, to do and to obtain justice, and thus avoid the necessity of again bringing this subject to the view of Congress."

SPECIAL MESSAGE.

"WASHINGTON, February 6, 1837.

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

"At the beginning of this session Congress was informed that our claims upon Mexico had not been adjusted, but that notwithstanding the irritating effect upon her councils of the movements in Texas I hoped, by great forbearance, to avoid the necessity of again bringing the subject of them to your notice. That hope has been disappointed. Having in vain urged upon that Government the justice of those claims and my indispensable obligation to insist that there shall be 'no further delay in the acknowledgment, if not in the redress, of the injuries complained of,' my duty requires that the whole subject should be presented, as it now is, for the action of Congress, whose exclusive right it is to decide on the further measures of redress to be employed. The length of time since some of the injuries have been committed, the repeated and unavailing applications for redress, the wanton character of some of the outrages upon the property and persons of our citizens, upon the officers and flag of the United States, independent of recent insults to this Government and people by the late extraordinary Mexican minister, would justify in the eyes of all nations immediate war. That remedy, however, should not be used by just and generous nations, confiding in their strength for injuries committed, if it can be honorably avoided; and it has occurred to me that, considering the present embarrassed condition of that country, we should act with both wisdom and moderation by giving to Mexico one more opportunity to atone for the past before we take redress into our own hands. To avoid all misconception on the part of Mexico, as well as to protect our own national character from reproach, this opportunity should be given with the avowed design and full preparation to take immediate satisfaction if it should not be obtained on a repetition of the demand for it. To this end I recommend that an act be passed authorizing reprisals and the use of the naval force of the United States by the Executive against Mexico to enforce them, in the event of a refusal by the Mexican Government to come to an amicable adjustment of the matters in controversy between us upon another demand thereof made from on board one of our vessels of war on the coast of Mexico."

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. CURTIS. In pursuance of the notice which I gave on the 2d instant, I submit the following resolution and ask that it be printed and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution (S. Res. 245) was referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XIX of the Standing Rules for conducting business in the Senate of the United States be amended by adding the following proviso at the end of the first paragraph of said rule, to wit:

Provided, That after any question has been considered upon 5 separate calendar days, or when any question has been debated for 10 consecutive hours, it shall be in order for any Senator to rise to a question of privilege and move to close all debate and vote at a fixed time upon the pending question before the Senate after 3 hours' additional consideration. Said motion shall be submitted to the Senate and shall be determined by a yea-and-nay vote. If a majority of the Senators present vote in favor of the motion, it shall be declared carried, debate shall close, and a vote taken upon the question as provided in the motion. If less than a majority vote for the motion, the same shall be declared lost.

Mr. CURTIS. At the request of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] I offer the following resolution in pursuance of notice which he gave and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution (S. Res. 246) was referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XIX of the Standing Rules for conducting business in the Senate of the United States be amended by adding the following proviso at the end of the first paragraph of said rule, to wit:

Provided, That after any measure has been considered upon three separate calendar days, or has been debated for six consecutive hours, no Senator shall speak more than one hour in the aggregate upon any such measure, and any amendment thereto, and any motion affecting the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

SEDITIOUS ACTS AND UTTERANCES.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed with the further consideration of Calendar No. 236, being Senate bill 3317.

Mr. BORAH. If unanimous consent is given, is not the debate limited to five minutes?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest to the Senator from South Dakota that it is not necessary to have unanimous consent. He can move to take up the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The morning business is closed, and the Senator can move to take up the bill.

Mr. STERLING. Then, instead of asking unanimous consent, in order to settle the question, I move that the Senate proceed to the further consideration of the bill to which I have referred.

Mr. BORAH. That removes any possibility of limitation by the five-minute rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. BORAH. All I want is an opportunity to present the matter a little more fully than I could do in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3317) to prohibit and punish certain seditious acts against the Government of the United States and to prohibit the use of the mails for the purpose of promoting such acts.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was absent from the Senate when the bill came up on last Tuesday until after it had passed out of the Committee of the Whole into the Senate, or I should have submitted my objections to the bill while it was in Committee of the Whole. I understand, however, that amendments may be offered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, yes.

Mr. BORAH. My particular objection to this bill is based upon the terms of section 3, which I read the other day and which I will read again. It reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That every document, book, circular, paper, journal, or other written or printed communication in or by which there is advocated or advised the overthrow by force or violence or by physical injury to person or property of the Government of the United States or of all government, or in or by which there is advocated or advised the use of force or violence or physical injury to or the seizure or destruction of persons or property as a means toward the accomplishment of economic, industrial, or political changes is hereby declared to be nonmailable and the same shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize any person other than an employee of the Dead Letter Office duly authorized thereto or other person upon a search warrant authorized by law to open any letter not addressed to himself.

It will be observed that this proposed law makes no provision for a hearing for those who may have their publications challenged and excluded from the mails. Admitting for the purpose of these remarks that the rule announced in section 3 is a wise and just rule, the manner of its enforcement is arbitrary and unjust. The method of the enforcement of a just law may be as objectionable as an unjust law. I earnestly urge, therefore, that there should be some impartial tribunal, one which could act promptly, but an impartial tribunal, where the question of objectionable material could be passed upon, if the power of exclusion, which is the power to destroy, is to be granted at all.

As my colleagues know, this embodies a principle to which I have offered objection many times in the last several years. My principal objection to the proposition lies in the fact that it precludes the possibility of any fair hearing upon the part of those who may be charged with violating the law.

I wish to repeat, for fear that I might be supposed to be discussing it from the standpoint of personal objection to the present incumbent of the office of Postmaster General, that it has nothing to do, of course, with any particular individual who may be occupying that position at any particular time.

The principle has long inhered in our laws and has been subject to abuse for a good many years, but of course it has been more accentuated during the last several years, especially since the war began, than ever before. More conditions have arisen which seem to invoke the necessity of applying laws which are now upon the statute books.

I know of a great many instances in which men have been prohibited from sending matter through the mails which, to my mind, seemed absolutely without any justice or reason at all. I recall particularly an instance where a party was brought here from near the Pacific coast to show cause why he should not have his publication excluded from the mails. I went through copies of the publication, one after another, and was wholly unable to find anything which to me seemed objectionable.

A party looking at it from a different angle might come, of course, to a different conclusion with perfect honesty and sincerity, but it comes to the question of erecting a tribunal which may pass upon the matter after the submission of facts and after the hearing of witnesses and after due publicity is had, as all hearings should be had in public, and rendering judgment upon a state of facts which are not ex parte or secured in an ex parte way.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator, but he does not contend, as I understood his observations, that the bill differs in principle from many statutes which have been enacted heretofore, notably the statute with reference to obscene and lascivious literature, the statute excluding from the mails any matter in regard to fraudulent misrepresentations, and so forth? The Senator does not claim that any greater powers are conferred by this bill upon the Postmaster General or the Post Office officials than have been conferred repeatedly with respect to legislation of the character to which I have just referred?

Mr. BORAH. I think the principle which is involved in this bill is the same as that involved in the statutes to which the Senator refers, although, of course, a law takes on a different color as it is extended to different subject matters.

In other words, we have now extended the power of the Postmaster General until a Postmaster General can erect a complete censorship over the press, the expressed opinion of this country. He can call before him a man who has published an article which seems to him objectionable, and by reason of the power which he has he can place the party publishing the paper or the pamphlet or the periodical under complete surveillance as to his future publications, and thereby control it, as in England they once invoked the license system. It enables the Postmaster General to say what shall be published and what shall not be published.

If this law stood alone, of course the range of activities would be circumscribed to some extent, but when you take it in connection with all the other laws which are now upon the statute books with reference to papers published in foreign languages and with reference to those things which are covered by the espionage acts now upon the statute books and other statutes which have been referred to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], it is within the power of the Postmaster General to cover practically the whole field of intellectual activities so far as publications are concerned.

If he desired to do so, if it were his wish to do so, the Postmaster General could take advantage of the situation not only to control a publication as to the specific matter in view, but he could control the trend and thought of the publication upon all matters, not by specific instructions—it is not necessary to give specific instructions—but only to advise the party who is publishing the paper that in his view such things ought not to be published at this time, and give his intimation along what lines it would be safe to proceed.

Coming back to the matter to which I had referred, I went through the publication and was unable to find anything which seemed to me objectionable under the law, but the solicitor general of the department thought otherwise. It precluded an impartial tribunal passing upon the proposition. The parties in interest, to a certain extent, must always be the department upon the one hand and the publisher upon the other. The department secures its facts in its own way and relies upon them. It may or may not have a hearing from the party who is interested as the publisher, but in any event the publisher knows that in all future publications he may again be called to a hearing and therefore he will make every effort to constrain to the views of the department.

It is the worst form of bureaucracy. It is the most vicious form of censorship. We ought not to extend it further than actually necessary, and we ought always to provide an impartial tribunal before which the publisher may go, introduce his facts, and submit his evidence, and have a decision as to his publication from a tribunal which is absolutely impartial.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very sure that anybody who has given any thought or any consideration to this subject must recognize that the opportunity for the abuse of the power conveyed by an act of this character, as detailed by the Senator from Idaho, exists; undoubtedly it does, but let me ask the Senator to look at the other side of the picture. Here is matter advocating private murder and the assassination of public officials going through the mails, carried by the Government of the United States at a very great expense over and above the actual price charged to the person mailing the stuff. Of course, the man who mails it does not do it publicly; the man who publishes it conceals the fact that he is the publisher; it is oftentimes difficult, and not infrequently impossible, to determine who is either the publisher or the mailer of that kind of matter. What would the Senator from Idaho do in a case of that kind?

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, if this material is circulated under a nom de plume or by some irresponsible party or some party who is unknown, I would not have any disturbance of mind over the effect it would have upon any human being. But I have in mind those whose identity is known. They should be given a hearing before an impartial tribunal.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me put another case to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment, if the Senator will pardon me. I am perfectly willing to be interrupted, but I want to finish my sentence.

On the other hand, if such matter is being sent out by a party who is detected, who is found to be the party responsible, there is a way to deal with him under proper rules of procedure; to try him and put him either into the insane asylum or into the penitentiary. That is my idea of dealing with the situation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, that solves the situation easily enough as to a man whom we can find.

Mr. BORAH. As to the man we can not find, I am not disturbed at all. I have a vast amount of confidence in the common sense and patriotism of the American people. They are not going to be disturbed nearly so much by an unknown and unidentified and unsigned leaflet reaching them through the mails as we here in the Senate sometimes think.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just let me present another case to the Senator from Idaho that those who have been concerned with this legislation have been obliged to consider. Here is a regular publication; the publisher is perfectly well known; ordinarily the issues are unexceptionable, or there may be more or less doubt about them, but not enough to exclude the publication from the mails. However, an issue comes out in which the assassination of public officials is urged as a proper method of securing governmental or economic changes. That goes into the mails, and of course you can punish the publisher for sending it; but upon what theory would the Senator advocate allowing such a publication to be carried and distributed throughout the country?

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, if you intercept the individual and try him and punish him, of course the publication altogether ceases, because he can not issue it if he is incarcerated in the penitentiary. But, in any event, he is entitled to a hearing before an impartial tribunal. A murderer is entitled to that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The publication can not be issued in future, but in the meantime the matter has gone out and has done its work.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says it "has done its work." I think we exaggerate that. I do not think that kind of literature has any appreciable effect upon men's action. But all this is beside the question I am presenting. Let me suppose a case. Suppose a publication is excluded from the mails; the man is ruined, his business destroyed; and yet it was such a publication as an impartial tribunal would not have excluded. Have we reached the point where arbitrary rule is the only means of government which we dare rely upon?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know whether the Senator has read the late report of the Attorney General, submitted in response to a resolution of the Senate in regard to this matter.

Mr. BORAH. I have looked over it. I only received it yesterday morning.

Mr. OVERMAN. I call the attention of the Senator to Exhibit X in that report and to the fact that it is set forth that circulars and documents have been sent out through the mails by irresponsible parties, nobody knowing who they are, to the poor colored man in the South advising him to rise up, to use torch and fire, and overthrow the white man of the South. The fact is that some of those people have risen up, and the result has been that the poor darkies have suffered, as they did in Arkansas and in other places where they had their meetings and did rise up, acting on the advice of such literature.

Those poor people had been behaving splendidly; they were making money; acquiring their own homes; they were satisfied and contented; in fact, they never were so contented as they are to-day, and they never were so happy as they are to-day; but here come along circulars and papers of an incendiary character sent through the mails, nobody knowing who sends them, inciting these people, many of whom are unable to read, to rise up and use the torch and sword and destroy the people with whom they live and who treat them kindly. Now, ought not that to be stopped? Ought not the circulation in the mails of such matter be stopped?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes; I would stop that; but I would not do so by giving to some Postmaster General autocratic power to pass upon all kinds of literature in the United States. I would give even the poor idiotic devil who sent out the literature the benefit of just methods of hearing.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment, if the Senator please. The difficulty is that you are putting in the hands of a head of a bureau power to determine a vital question having relation to the public thought of the country, without giving opportunity for the man who may be charged with dereliction of having any hearing whatever. I say that infinitely worse than that is to have some irresponsible piece of literature sent through the mails. When you build up autocratic institutions which wrong all your people, you do an injury to the innocent more than the guilty. Why, assassins, murderers lying in wait, porch climbers are given a fair trial. The greatest liberty man can enjoy is the liberty of opinion, and I want it to remain free.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I was going to suggest to the Senator the importance of keeping this literature out of the hands of irresponsible people. It is not so much the intelligent man or woman as to whom there would be any danger of being improperly influenced by such literature or such publications; but it is the crank, the degenerate, the abnormal creature.

In the document to which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has referred the Senator will find the testimony in reference to the man Czolgosz, who assassinated President McKinley. The evidence shows clearly that he was influenced by the publication of just the sort of material described in the pending bill. In his own statement—page 74—he says: "I was reading various papers"; and he names four socialistic papers evidently favoring anarchy, the destruction of all government and authority, and that sort of thing. If we can keep out of the mails literature of that character, we will prevent its reaching such people, who are dangerous people—there is no guess about that; our experience shows it—and who are influenced in that way. It seems to me the only way we can attain the object is to prevent this matter being distributed through the mails.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if you want to exclude it, what is the necessity of overturning all our theories of free government by depriving a man of a fair tribunal where he may be heard and submit his facts, thereby detecting the guilty and excluding the innocent?

Mr. President, the bureaucratic system of government is spreading day by day until it is taking hold of all the activities of both the economic and intellectual world. I, of course, may be in error, but in my observation and in my association with the people of this country I find it one of the great sources of discontent among the people right now. They feel that their Government is organized and organizing against giving them what they supposed they were always entitled to—a fair hearing whenever they were charged with misconduct under the law. You do not get that under the departments; it is not in the nature of things that you should have it. It is not because the departments are headed by men any different from other men; it is not because they are any different in their attributes than Members of the Senate; but give any man the power autocratically to pass upon these questions and he will autocratically use it, as has been done in all times and as always will be done.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has not the right of appeal been given in many cases?

Mr. BORAH. It has not been given in this case.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know a great many cases have been settled on appeal.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, irrespective now of the question as to whether in terms any such right is given in this bill, does not the party have the right to appeal to the courts, to bring his action to enjoin or restrain the act of the Postmaster General in interfering with his mail or stopping his mail? I have had within the last day or two, but I have it not here to-day, I find, a copy of a report from the Postmaster General himself in which he refers to actions brought in the court against his action in excluding from the mails certain literature. He says the action of the Postmaster General was sustained in every single case. The party is not deprived of his rights.

Mr. BORAH. It would not have been sustained in a good many cases if I had been on the bench.

Mr. STERLING. I presume the Senator is interested particularly in knowing that the person against whom action is taken has his right to be heard in court and to bring an action.

Mr. BORAH. I say that it is an assumption to say that the man who is, for instance, in California or in the State of Washington will get his rights if he is compelled to travel from California or from the State of Washington to bring an action in the District of Columbia against the Postmaster General.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to suggest that, while I have not examined the report of the Postmaster General, the injunction cases were very likely decided by the court on the proposition that the Congress had passed a law allowing the Postmaster General the discretion and the court would not interfere with it, although the court itself in passing on the same question might have disagreed with the Postmaster General.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, to say to a man whose publication has been excluded from the mails, if he lives in some remote part of the country, a man of limited means, that he shall have the blessed privilege of coming to Washington and bringing a suit in the District of Columbia against the Postmaster General and try it out within the next two years as to whether or not he shall continue his publication, is, of course, to deny him any right at all. In the meantime his publication has ceased, his subscribers have gone, the men who were patronizing it in a business way have quit, he is ruined, and he has upon his hands a lawsuit 2,000 miles from home and an attorney whom he has not the means to pay.

Mr. President, this is one of the conditions which always accompany war and always follow as a result of the conditions through which we are passing. After the Napoleonic wars England went through the same process and tried out all of these experiments. She passed laws excluding material from the mails, prohibiting the assemblage of the people except upon the consent of a magistrate, taxed publications, and in every possible way sought to prevent the issuance of publications without their being censored or in some way reviewed by those in authority. The attempt was a complete failure. It did not accomplish the thing that the Government desired to accomplish. As Mr. May says in his Constitutional History of England, it resulted in the people doing secretly and clandestinely and by secret gatherings what otherwise they would have done in a more public and less dangerous way.

I wish to call attention, Mr. President, to some of the experiences through which they passed at that time. I read from May's Constitutional History of England, Volume II, page 81. He says:

> Papers were laid before Parliament containing evidence of the state of the country, which were immediately followed by the introduction of further measures of repression—then designated and since familiarly known as the "Six acts." The first deprived defendants in cases of misdemeanor of the right of traversing—

That is precisely what we do here. In this departmental procedure there is no issue framed, there is no opportunity to deny, unless in the discretion of the department it is given. There is no opportunity for a hearing—> to which Lord Holland induced the chancellor to add a clause obliging the attorney general to bring defendants to trial within 12 months. By a second it was proposed to enable the court, on the conviction of a publisher of a seditious libel, to order the seizure of all copies of the libel in his possession and to punish him on a second conviction with fine, imprisonment, banishment, or transportation. By a third, the newspaper-stamp duty was imposed upon pamphlets and other papers containing news or observations on public affairs, and recognizances were required from the publishers of newspapers and pamphlets for the payment of any penalty. By a fourth, no meeting of more than 50 persons was permitted to be held without six days' notice being given by seven householders to a resident justice of the peace, and all but freeholders or inhabitants of the county, parish, or township were prohibited from attending under penalty of fine and imprisonment—

That is the way they did business at that time, and it is the same tendency which characterizes our present legislation—

> The justice could change the proposed time and place of meeting, but no meeting was permitted to adjourn itself. Every meeting tending to incite people to hatred and contempt of the King's person, or the government and constitution of the realm, was declared an unlawful assembly, and extraordinary powers were given to justices for the dispersion of such meetings and the capture of persons addressing them. If any persons should be killed or injured in the dispersion of an unlawful meeting the justice was indemnified. Attending a meeting with arms or with flags, banners, or other ensigns or emblems—

Such as are prohibited in this bill—> was an offense punishable with two years' imprisonment. Lecture and debating rooms were to be licensed and open to inspection. By a fifth, the training of persons in the use of arms was prohibited; and by a sixth, the magistrates in the disturbed counties were empowered to search for and seize arms.

> All these measures, except that for prohibiting military training, were strenuously opposed in both houses. They were justified by the Government on the ground of the dangers which threatened society. It was argued by Lord Castlereagh "that unless we could reconcile the exercise of our liberties with the preservation of the public peace our liberties would inevitably perish." It was said that blasphemous and seditious libels were undermining the very foundations of society, while public meetings, under pretense of discussing grievances, were assembled for purposes of intimidation and the display of physical force. Even the example of the French Revolution was not yet considered out of date, but was still relied on in justification of these measures.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. BORAH. I am reading from May's Constitutional History of England.

As a result of all these laws of repression and oppression, as a result of the studied attempt of the Parliament to control public opinion and to suppress all statements which indicated disrespect for or violence toward the Government, the author has this to say:

> Let us now examine the general results of the long contest which had been maintained between ill-regulated, mischievous, and often criminal struggles of the people for freedom on the one hand and the harsh policy of repression maintained by the Government on the other. The last 28 years of the reign of George III formed a period of perilous transition for liberty of opinion. While the right of free discussion had been discredited by factious license, by wild and dangerous theories, by turbulence and sedition, the Government and legislature, in guarding against these excesses, had discountenanced and repressed legitimate agitation.

There, Mr. President, is where the menace lies in laws of this kind. It is the impossibility, under autocratic and bureaucratic and arbitrary power, to suppress that which ought to be suppressed without going far beyond and stifling agitation; and agitation, after all, Mr. President, is the lifeblood of a republic.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator now if he sees anything at all in the terms of this bill that will tend to stifle or invite the stifling of legitimate agitation?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I do. I have just explained what it was. Under this clause the Postmaster General may supervise the publication of any article or any publication and control its publication if he sees fit to do so.

Mr. STERLING. Under the terms of the bill it prevents only the circulation of that material that advocates the overthrow of the Government by force and violence. That is all that he is given a right to exclude from the mails under the terms of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. It all depends upon what the Postmaster General considers the overthrow of the Government by force and violence. As was said by the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes the other day, these general authorities covering force and violence for all future times and all things are so indefinite that they give too much power. Besides, that is precisely what they were doing at that time.

They were confining it to the proposition of sedition, of violence, of force, of disloyalty, and of treason, and so forth, as they construed it. Now, I am not objecting to a curtailment of these activities along certain lines, if you will erect a tribunal which is a fair tribunal where the men may be heard, and where evidence may be considered and witnesses heard, and where the power of publicity may beat in upon it to see that no injustice is done.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator if Great Britain was not led by positive legislation to restrict what the Senator is pleased to call legitimate activities, instead of confining it to sedition, treason, and so forth?

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President. Parliament was seeking to do precisely what the Senator is seeking to do, confining it to those things which have the characteristics of sedition, of violence, of force, of the preachment of opposition to the Government and the person of the King.

Mr. STERLING. That is very general and indefinite.

Mr. BORAH. So is your bill very general and indefinite.

Mr. STERLING. No; it is not very general. There is just where the Senator and I disagree. The bill is specific in its terms, and defines exactly what things are to be excluded from the mails. I think the Senator will not find in the history of English law upon this subject quite the parallel case, or the things to justify the statement that he has made.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, of course, we are not living in that age, but the principle involved is precisely the same. They simply denied these men a hearing upon those things which the Government characterized as seditious or the preaching of violence and force. Now, then, if you will erect a tribunal where men may be heard, where the facts may be submitted, where witnesses may be heard, that is a different proposition entirely, although it is the most futile thing that men ever engaged in to undertake to control public thought or opinion. If we can not by our own teachings and by our own preachments inculcate into the hearts of the American people the belief, as against any preachments that may be made to the contrary, that this is the best form of government for them, you may pass all the laws that you will and engage in all the oppression that you may, and in the end it will result in naught. Rulers and despots and frightened legislators have tried for 3,000 years to control opinions by law, by force, by arbitrary measures, and the attempt has been a failure. It is a very limited way in which the laws can operate successfully in regard to these things. Free press, free speech, free assembly have their evils, but the experience of mankind has convinced the wisest that these evils are infinitely less than the evils of a controlled press, of denial of free speech and free assemblage.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will recall that some years ago one Johann Most was charged before the court with the public advocacy, by speech and writing, of anarchy and the assassination of public officers. Would not the argument of the Senator reach the conclusion that it was an unwise thing to prosecute Mr. Most for that conduct?

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President. If I remember correctly, Herr Most had a hearing and a trial.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BORAH. Well, give these people an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is another point. I was not asking the Senator's attention to that. I was addressing myself to the remark just now made by the Senator, that the way to deal with these things is to allow them to go unmolested, trusting to the judgment of the good people of the country that these pernicious doctrines will not be accepted. I thought that the argument the Senator is now making led to that conclusion.

Mr. BORAH. I repeat, Mr. President, that you must get back to the proposition of pitting your teachings and your views as to the wisdom, as to the justice of our Government and our institutions against the views of those who are arrayed against it for ultimate decision in this country. I have no doubt at all about that; and there is not a page of history, from the democracies of Greece to this hour, that does not teach that fact.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That presents squarely the question as to the wisdom of prosecuting Johann Most.

Mr. BORAH. No; when it comes to acts, men are responsible for their acts. I am speaking now of expression of opinions. I want to say, however distasteful it may be to Senators here, that I am one of those who stand against the attempt to repress and to suppress the expression of opinion. I believe in the wisdom, in the patriotism, in the sanity, and in the poise of the American people. Woodrow Wilson once said, and it was one of the wisest things he ever said, that when a man has a pernicious doctrine the best thing to do is to rent him a public hall and let him express himself; the American people will take care of him.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. The bill does not forbid the expression of opinion as to the form of government, as to whether it is the best kind of a government or not. It does not prevent an expression of the opinion that the soviet or Bolshevik government is the best government; but it does prohibit a man from advocating or advising the overthrow of this Government or of all Governments by force or violence.

Mr. BORAH. There is not one man in fifty who has sat at the head of the Postmaster General's department, or ever will, who would not exclude any publication as violating this law which advocated a soviet government.

Mr. STERLING. I think the Senator from Idaho is hardly warranted by the terms of the bill in making a statement like that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, I hold in my hand a pamphlet which came to me through the mails advocating just such a government.

Mr. BORAH. You had better not let the Postmaster General get hold of it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Postmaster General's attention has been called to it time and time again. Not only that, Mr. President, but the attention of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate has been called to it—the Judiciary Committee that reported this bill about which the Senator is speaking—and the Judiciary Committee has declared that the Government is powerless to interfere with it.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I was reading Mr. Gompers's speech the other day in which he recounted about 50 instances in which Members of the Senate and other public officials declared how a certain law would be construed and how it would be administered, but when it got before Judge Anderson out in Indiana it was construed in a different way and administered in a different way.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is quite aside from this question.

Mr. BORAH. No; it is not beside it at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am calling the attention of the Senator to the fact that this particular document, advocating a soviet government, has been circulated through the mails, and I am calling the attention of the Senator to the fact that the attention of the Postmaster General has been called to it, and that the attention of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate has been called to it, and that none of them ever felt that there was any power in the Government to prevent the circulation of it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I know of instances in which a publication was excluded from the mails because it contained a very earnest, and perhaps some would say violent, defense of the first amendment of the Constitution of the United States, which guarantees the right of free speech and a free press, and denouncing those who were attempting to suppress free speech.

I quote further from May's Constitutional History of England:

> Men who boldly impeached the conduct of their rulers had been punished for sedition. The discussion of grievances—the highest privilege of freemen—had been checked and menaced. The assertion of popular rights had been denounced by ministers and frowned upon by society, until low demagogues were able to supplant the natural leaders of the people in the confidence of those classes who most needed safe guidance. Authority was placed in constant antagonism to large masses of people, who had no voice in the government of their country. Mutual distrust and alienation grew up between them. The people lost confidence in rulers whom they know only by oppressive taxes and harsh laws severely administered. The Government, harassed by suspicions of disaffection, detected conspiracy and treason in every murmur of popular discontent.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] will observe that "the Government, harassed by suspicions of disaffection, detected conspiracy and treason in every murmur of popular discontent." That is the way it always results.

I recognize the very great difficulty, Mr. President, of drawing a clear line of demarcation between that which constitutes a punishable act, or an act which should be punishable under the law, and that which should be permitted to pass as the mere expression of opinion, however critical or however severe that expression may be. But I have come to the conclusion that one thing is true—that in order to do justice to those who claim the right to express their views upon public questions, to criticize the Government, to insist upon changes and upon reforms, it is necessary at least to have an impartial tribunal before which hearings shall always be had in regard to these matters; that it is wrong, that it is unwise, as a governmental policy to ask men to submit to the mere autocratic decision, without an opportunity of their being heard, not only of some head of department but of some subordinate in the department, because it is absolutely impossible for the head of the department to take charge of all these matters.

At least, Mr. President, if you shall go no further, create a tribunal which corresponds to the Anglo-Saxon idea of a hearing and a determination of an important question.

I want to call attention, Mr. President, to a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, handed down a few days ago, involving a principle akin to this proposition. I will read from the dissenting opinion, and of course I do not read it as the opinion of the court, but as expressing the view which I think ought to finally obtain in regard to this matter, and which I think will finally obtain. With all due respect, therefore, to the majority of the court, I read the minority opinion as expressing the view which I think the Congress ought to follow in legislation. This is the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Holmes, concurred in by Mr. Justice Brandeis. It reads:

> This indictment is founded wholly upon the publication of two leaflets, which I shall describe in a moment. The first count charges a conspiracy pending the war with Germany to publish abusive language about the form of government of the United States, laying the preparation and publishing of the first leaflet as overt acts. The second count charges a conspiracy pending the war to publish language intended to bring the form of government into contempt, laying the preparation and publishing of the two leaflets as overt acts. The third count alleges a conspiracy to encourage resistance to the United States in the same war and to attempt to effectuate the purpose by publishing the same leaflets. The fourth count lays a conspiracy to incite curtailment of production of things necessary to the prosecution of the war and to attempt to accomplish it by publishing the second leaflet to which I have referred.
> The first of these leaflets says that the President's cowardly silence about the intervention in Russia reveals the hypocrisy of the plutocratic gang in Washington. It intimates that "German militarism combined with allied capitalism to crush the Russian revolution"—goes on that the tyrants of the world fight each other until they see a common enemy, working-class enlightenment, when they combine to crush it; and that now militarism and capitalism combined, though not openly, to crush the Russian revolution. It says that there is only one enemy of the workers of the world, and that is capitalism; that it is a crime for workers of America, etc., to fight the workers' republic of Russia, and ends "Awake! Awake, you workers of the world! Revolutionists." A note adds, "It is absurd to call us pro-German. We hate and despise German militarism more than do you hypocritical tyrants. We have more reason for denouncing German militarism than has the coward of the White House."
> The other leaflet, headed "Workers—Wake Up," with abusive language says that America, together with the Allies, will march for Russia to help the Czecho-Slovaks in their struggle against the Bolsheviki, and that this time the hypocrites shall not fool the Russian emigrants and friends of Russia in America.
> No argument seems to me necessary to show that these pronunciamentos in no way attack the form of government of the United States, or that they do not support either of the first two counts. What little I have to say about the third count may be postponed until I have considered the fourth. * * *
> I am aware, of course, that the word intent, as vaguely used in ordinary legal discussion, means no more than knowledge at the time of the act that the consequences said to be intended will ensue.
> But as against dangers peculiar to war, as against others, the principle of the right to free speech is always the same. It is only the present danger of immediate evil or an intent to bring it about that warrants Congress in setting a limit to the expression of opinion where private rights are not concerned. Congress certainly can not forbid all effort to change the mind of the country. Now, nobody can suppose that the surreptitious publishing of a silly leaflet by an unknown man, without more, would present any immediate danger that its opinions would hinder the success of the Government arms or have any appreciable tendency to do so. Publishing those opinions for the very purpose of obstructing, however, might indicate a greater danger, and at any rate would have the quality of an attempt. * * *

In this case sentences of 20 years imprisonment have been imposed for the publishing of two leaflets that I believe the defendants had as much right to publish as the Government has to publish the Constitution of the United States now vainly invoked by them. Even if I am technically wrong and enough can be squeezed from these poor and puny anonymities to turn the color of legal litmus paper—I will add, even if what I think the necessary intent were shown—the most nominal punishment seems to me all that possibly could be inflicted unless the defendants are to be made to suffer not for what the indictment alleges but for the creed that they avow, a creed that I believe to be the creed of ignorance and immaturity when honestly held, as I see no reason to doubt that it was held here, but which, although made the subject of examination at the trial, no one has a right even to consider in dealing with the charges before the court.

Persecution for the expression of opinion seems to me perfectly logical. If you have no doubt of your premises or your power and want a certain result with all your heart, you naturally express your wishes in law and sweep away all opposition. To allow opposition by speech seems to indicate that you think the speech impotent, as when a man says that he has squared the circle, or that you do not care whole-heartedly for the result, or that you doubt either your power or your premises. But when men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market, and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out. That, at any rate, is the theory of our Constitution. It is an experiment, as all life is an experiment. Every year, if not every day, we have to wager our salvation upon some prophecy based upon imperfect knowledge. While that experiment is part of our system, I think that we should be eternally vigilant against attempts to check the expression of opinions that we loathe and believe to be fraught with death, unless they so imminently threaten immediate interference with the lawful and pressing purposes of the law that an immediate check is required to save the country. I wholly disagree with the argument of the Government that the first amendment left the common law as to seditious libel in force. History seems to me against the notion. I had conceived that the United States through many years had shown its repentance for the sedition act of 1798 by repaying fines that it imposed. * * *

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Idaho kindly suspend at this point while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated?

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. BORAH (continuing the reading)—

> Only the emergency that makes it immediately dangerous to leave the correction of evil counsels to time warrants making any exception to the sweeping command, "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech." Of course, I am speaking only of expressions of opinion and exhortations, which were all that were uttered here, but I regret that I can not put into more impressive words my belief that in their conviction upon this indictment the defendants were deprived of their rights under the Constitution of the United States.

And of that I have no doubt whatever.

Just a word further, because I do not care to take up the time of the Senate, and I will say to the Senator in charge of the bill that I am not going to occupy very much more time in regard to it. I realize, of course, that ultimately it will pass, but I was not willing that it should go without a full statement of my views in regard to it. When it comes up again it will take me but a short time to conclude what I have to say. This I want to leave as my final suggestion for to-day's consideration of it, that my primary objection to this particular measure is that it affords the parties who may be charged with dereliction under the law no opportunity to be heard, such as is contemplated by Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence and our theory of adjusting and determining the rights of people when charged with wrongdoing.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator from Idaho whether he has proposed any amendment?

Mr. BORAH. I am going to propose to strike out section 3.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Chamberlain	Fall	Hitchcock
Ball	Culberson	Fletcher	Johnson, Calif.
Bankhead	Cummins	France	Johnson, S. Dak.
Beckham	Curtis	Gay	Jones, Wash.
Borah	Dial	Hale	Kellogg

King	Nugent	Smith, Md.	Walsh, Mass.
La Follette	Overman	Spencer	Walsh, Mont.
Lodge	Phipps	Sterling	Warren
McKellar	Pomerene	Sutherland	Watson
Moses	Sheppard	Swanson	Williams
New	Simmons	Thomas
Newberry	Smith, Ga.	Underwood

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CUMMINS resumed and concluded the speech begun by him on Tuesday. The speech entire is as follows:

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in beginning consideration of the bill which has been reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce for the further regulation of the railways and other common carriers of the country it may be well to suggest the procedure which the committee—or at least the chairman of the committee—has in view with respect to it.

The House has passed a bill upon this subject which has come to the Senate, has been referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and upon which no action has been taken. While there are some common points or common provisions as between the House bill and the bill which is now under consideration in the Senate, fundamentally speaking they are dissimilar; they are strikingly unlike.

I have thought that it would tend to simplicity and clearness and ease of consideration if the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of the Senate bill, and after making it such a bill as approves itself to the judgment of the Senate, that then the Senate bill shall be substituted for the House bill, and in that way present a foundation for a conference between the two Houses and thus reach an agreement upon this very important subject. That will be the course pursued so far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. President, I think no one realizes more completely or fully than I do the magnitude and the difficulties of the task I am about to assume. There are in this country something like 260,000 miles of main-track railway. These systems of railways serve 100,000,000 people and furnish them with their chief means of transportation and communication. It is obvious that any system of transportation in a commercial, civilized country is the basic fundamental industry of that country, for without adequate facilities for communication and transportation and without a service rendered for reasonable compensation the growth and development of the country is impossible.

The problem that we have before us is vastly more complicated and intricate than is presented in the transportation problem of any other country in the world. This is due to the extent of our country, the variety of its productions, and the dissimilarity of the conditions under which business is carried on, as well as the dissimilarity of conditions under which transportation is furnished.

Recognizing these difficulties as well as the importance of these questions, I beg to say that as I go forward in explanation of the bill which has been reported by the committee I solicit rather than repel interrogation. I am not here for the purpose of delivering an oration, but simply for the purpose of giving to the Senate the views of a majority of the committee which has presented the bill. The only thing that I will ask—and I do ask it earnestly of Senators—is that as I go forward in analyzing the bill the questions which may be propounded to me shall relate to the subject which I am for the moment discussing.

[At this point Mr. CUMMINS yielded to Mr. KELLOGG, who made the point that there was no quorum present, and the Secretary called the roll.]

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, with respect to the pending subject, I hope that, however kind the intent may be, there will be few occasions upon which it will be found necessary to call for a quorum. I do not desire to be interrupted for that purpose, for it is quite evident either that Senators know all about this subject, and therefore do not find it necessary to listen to a discussion of the bill, or that they are indifferent about the subject, and therefore a discussion of the bill in their presence would accomplish little. I say this with perfect good feeling, for I know how difficult it is for Senators to arrange their affairs to be present upon the occasion of a dissertation upon a very important but, to some persons, a very uninteresting subject.

Mr. President, in order that I may be entirely understood as I pass through this bill, it is quite proper for me to say at this time that I am one of the Senators who believe that transportation is a governmental function. A single reflection upon the conditions throughout the world as well as in our own country will demonstrate that the furnishing of transportation to a commercial people is a governmental function. Aside from those in the United States, substantially all of the railways of the world are owned and operated by the governments of the various countries. I might qualify that by saying that Great Britain has not yet become the owner of her railways, but her policy at this time is one that is the equivalent of government ownership and operation. In so far as I am concerned, I desire that basic statement to be carried all the way through the argument I shall make upon this bill.

The only reason that I am in favor of private ownership and private operation is because I believe that better and cheaper transportation can be furnished to the people of this country through the instrumentality of private ownership and private operation than can be furnished to the people of the country through direct Government operation; but there is nothing inconsistent with the best forms of government in Government ownership and operation of our systems of transportation. The Government has the right to select the agencies or instrumentalities which will most certainly render to the people the service they require, and, if the Government believes as I believe, that the services can be rendered and will be rendered more adequately and more cheaply through private corporations under strict public supervision, it has the right, of course, and it is its duty, of course, to select such agencies for the purpose of rendering the service which all the people require.

It is, I think, elemental in a business of this character, if it be a Government function, as I think it is, that the transportation shall first be adequate to meet existing and future needs of the country, and, second, that it shall be furnished at the lowest possible cost consistent with fairness to the men who render the service and to the capital which is invested in the facilities of transportation.

There is another general underlying suggestion that I desire to make. If we are to employ the instrumentalities of private capital, private ownership, in rendering the service of transportation, we must then answer the inquiry whether there shall be one system of transportation—that is to say, whether all of the railways of the country shall be unified or consolidated into one system under one control—or whether the railways shall be divided into several systems. I answer that, so far as I am individually concerned, by saying that, while I readily admit that there are some advantages which could be secured through one system rather than through several, I believe—and that is the judgment of the committee as well—that the service will be better and cheaper if rendered through several systems, amongst which there may be that honorable rivalry which heretofore at least has been regarded as the most effective motive for human effort. Therefore the committee has adopted the plan of several corporations rather than of a single one. I shall discuss more in detail that general proposition a little later on.

Naturally the first thing that occurs to the minds of Senators is a desire to know something with respect to the operation of our railways by the Government during the last two years; and inasmuch as this bill provides for a system of accounting or settlement between the railway companies and the Government, it is material, and I think essential, that I should spend a few minutes in discussing what has been accomplished and what is yet to be done through the Government operation of 1918 and 1919.

The Federal control bill, which became a law on the 21st of March, 1918, provided, as you all know, for the possession on the part of the Government of all the railway systems of the United States of which the President chose to take possession, under a paragraph of the act of 1916, of which I think the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] was the author. The dominating features of the act of 1918 were, first, a provision authorizing the President to enter into agreements with the railway systems of which he took possession relating to the compensation to be paid to these several companies while under Federal control. This compensation in the aggregate, and as related to class 1 railroads, amounted, in round numbers, to $900,000,000 annually; and here I may be permitted to say that on the 1st of January, 1918, the President, in fact, took possession of all of the railways of the United States. I say "all." There may have been very slight and negligible exceptions, but it is practically true that when the notices were sent out by the President on the 1st of January, 1918, they comprised all the railway systems of the country. The act of March 21, 1918, provided, however, that at any time prior to the 1st of July, 1918, the President could dismiss from Federal control any system or systems of railway which in his judgment it was not necessary to retain in order to carry out the purposes of the act. I may remark again that there were some of us who believed that justice required that all the railways of the United States be retained in the possession of the Government, because we felt that it was utterly impossible for the President to disassociate the railways and do justice to those which were dismissed from operation, inasmuch as the relation between the railways held by the Government and the railways not held by the Government was so intimate and intricate that to abandon that relation would probably result in great hardship.

It has resulted in great hardship. That law was passed, and the President vetoed it. That is my recollection. But, at any rate, just before the 1st of July, 1918, the President formally discharged a very large number of the railways of the country from Federal control. I think that he discharged at that time, or had before that time discharged, something more than 800 of the railways. These were, generally speaking, short-line railways, which depended for their maintenance largely upon their traffic relations with the trunk lines. The $900,000,000 of which I have spoken as the maximum of the compensation provided for in the act of March 21, 1918, is the compensation for what is known as the class 1 roads; and the class 1 roads, as you all remember, are those railways whose gross revenues from operation amount to $1,000,000 or more per year.

I want to fasten your minds upon the compensation of $900,000,000 per year, which the act provides for. It authorized the President to enter into contracts with these railway companies which were retained in Federal control, and to an extent that has been done. There are about 162 class 1 railroads. They vary from year to year. In the test period, as I remember, there were about 162 railroads falling within that classification. The last time the committee had any information from the Railroad Administration upon the subject, the administration had entered into contracts with something like 50 of these railroads. The administration prepared what it called and what was in fact a standard form of contract, and for a year and a half negotiations have been in progress between the several railways and the administration looking to the execution of these contracts; but a good many of the lesser railroads in class 1 have not entered into contract with the Government, and are probably depending upon the provisions of the act of March 21, 1918, for their compensation. Nevertheless, what I have said is true, that so far as the standard compensation is concerned, computed according to the terms of the bill, the annual outlay for the class 1 roads would be substantially $900,000,000.

One other outstanding fact must not be forgotten. In the law and in the contracts, in so far as they have been executed, there is the provision that the railroads must be returned to their owners, whenever they are returned, in as good condition as when taken by the Government. The railroads are already making vast and, I hope, unfounded claims in that regard; and when I come to speak of the state of the account between the Government and the railroads, it must be understood that I am not including the unliquidated claims which the railways have made and are making against the Government on account of an alleged depreciation in the value of their properties as compared with the value when the Government exercised its right to take them over on the 1st of January, 1918.

One other fact will be borne in mind. Aside from all the railway revenues of the two years which have now practically passed, Congress has appropriated, to enable the Government to carry on these railways, $1,250,000,000. This money, I may say, roundly speaking, and more, has been expended for the purposes for which it was appropriated; and you will remark as I go on that I am not here for the purpose of any criticism upon the Railroad Administration. That is not pertinent to the objects I have in view. We are dealing here with proposed legislation, and it makes no difference whether the Railroad Administration has been wasteful or whether it has been economical; the legislation must be the same.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator recall the fact that the Railroad Administration during the pendency of the last deficiency bill asked for $500,000 000 more than was given them? They got $750,000,000, and they asked for $1,250,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. What I said, I think, is true.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; what the Senator said is true, too.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Railroad Administration asked for more than the Congress gave it.

Mr. CURTIS. That is true.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Congress appropriated $500,000,000 in the act of March 1, 1918, and it appropriated $750,000,000 a year ago; but however that may be, the money has been appropriated and it has been expended.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator comprehend the amount or amounts that may have been advanced to the railroads by the Finance Corporation out of the $500,000,000 which we authorized for the purpose of establishing and assisting corporations, with authority to issue its bonds, and so forth, in order to expend money for or make loans to railroad and other corporations? A direct appropriation which we made in a special deficiency act approved last June carried to the use of the railroads $750,000,000, and enough had already been provided in the organic act to make a total of a billion and a quarter—this, of course, entirely outside of the five hundred millions authorized for the Finance Corporation.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I understand it, so far as the Railroad Administration was concerned, there have been appropriated altogether $1,250,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. That is correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. And it is with that sum and its effect upon the accounting that I now proceed to deal.

The great, prominent fact that all of us must understand and that the people of this country must appreciate is that, according to the last statement—and I emphasize the words "last statement"—of the Railroad Administration, the situation on the 1st of January will be about as follows: If the Government were to pay to the railroads all that it owes them and if the railroads were to pay to the Government all that they owe the Government, which is impossible, there would still be a deficit or a loss, occasioned by the two years of governmental operation, of something like $650,000,000. My judgment is and I predict now that when the final accounts are rendered the loss will be considerably more than $650,000,000; but I am using that sum because it is found in a statement recently furnished to the committee by the Railroad Administration. That is to say, not including the claims which I mentioned a few moments ago arising out of alleged depreciation or injury to property, after everything is paid there will be returned to the Treasury $600,000,000 of the $1,250,000,000 appropriated.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Iowa has just referred to the deficit. It will be valuable information, I think, for the Senate to remember that after the increase in freight rates, which was alleged to be 25 per cent, it was stated or predicted that the railroads would net a profit to the Government of $100,000,000. In spite of that, we have the deficit which the Senator has referred to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I intend to refer to that particular situation a little later on.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In figuring out the difference of $600,000,000 which the Government will have incurred as a loss after the railroads have paid to the Government what they owe and after the Government has paid to the railroads what it owes, I ask the Senator if there is any question about there being paid to the Government any of the indebtedness which some of the railroads will owe?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no reason to believe that there is any serious question with regard to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in figuring the sum of $600,000,000 does the Senator mean to say that when the accounts are settled or adjusted there will be $650,000,000 restored to the Government of the $1,250,000,000 that has already been appropriated?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Government's loss as now estimated is $646,000,000. I ought to say, in fairness to the Railroad Administration, that it is quite impossible to be exactly accurate with regard to that, because the reports for the last month and a half have not been fully analyzed. But the loss in round numbers is $650,000,000; the appropriation was $1,250,000,000; so that there will be returned some time to the Treasury, whenever the railroads are able to pay what they owe, about $600,000,000, and the people from taxation must bear the loss of $650,000,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator touches there the question I was raising. The Senator said he did not think there would be any serious doubt as to the ability of the railroads to pay to the Government what they owe. What is the reason that that can not be paid at the present time?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am going to explain that fully. When I say that there is no serious doubt about it, I am, of course, premising that answer by the assumption that Congress will deal fairly enough with the railroad companies to enable them to go on successfully. It is not difficult to conjecture a situation in which the railroad companies would not be able to pay the debt which has been accumulated against them by the Government.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. This debt is not altogether a voluntary debt. The Railroad Administration has added facilities and property to the railroads of the country which have resulted in this indebtedness very largely. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I was about to ask the Senator with respect to the obligations due the Government. The Senator stated that $1,250,000,000 had been loaned by the Government to the railroads.

Mr. CUMMINS. More than that.

Mr. KING. One billion two hundred and fifty million?

Mr. CUMMINS. More than that. I was about to say that we have loaned to the railroads, for additions and betterments alone, more than a billion and a half dollars. That is, the Government has incurred obligations, which in turn the railroad companies must discharge, for considerably more than a billion and a half dollars, and that for additions and betterments which are chargeable to capital account alone, without reckoning the other expenditures which have been made, and which ordinarily are paid from current income.

Mr. KING. The question I was about to propound was, knowing that the advances had been made in excess of that—that is, by credits if not by actual appropriations—will not Congress be called upon to make a further appropriation?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will come to that gradually. I do not want to anticipate my explanation. I do not want to startle the country too quickly, because that is one of the most distressing things that we have to consider.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. What provision has been made by law for the advancement of this very large sum to the railroads? Under what act was it made?

Mr. CUMMINS. We made provision for the advancement of $1,250,000,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that; but the Senator said that a very much larger sum had been advanced.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Government, by withholding from the railway companies the compensation which was to be paid under the act of 1918, has been enabled to advance to them some of their own money. At least that is the sum and substance of it. I will try to make that perfectly clear, that the Government has paid, or will pay between now and the 1st of January, for additions, betterments, and so forth, about a billion and a half dollars. The Government will owe the railroads on January 1, less payments in the meantime, whatever may be paid, for compensation and depreciation, a billion two hundred millions of dollars.

The point of all of this explanation is that under this bill about $225,000,000 can be taken from the compensation which the Government will owe the railroads and applied upon the indebtedness which the railways owe the Government; and if so, the account will stand in practically this way: This bill provides that indebtedness of that character shall be carried by the Government for a period of 10 years. It will be funded at 6 per cent interest for 10 years. That is the maximum time.

You will all remember that the other day we passed a bill which provided for the formation of what is known as an equipment trust. That is, the Government bought for the various railways equipment—engines, cars, and the like—to the amount of $372,000,000. The railways struggled against the insistence of the Government in the matter, did not want to pay for this equipment, at least did not want to pay the prices which the Government had agreed to pay, and had paid, possibly, for it. But finally that matter was adjusted and the equipment was allocated or distributed all over the country to the various railroads, each taking the part of it which was agreed upon.

The Railroad Administration, in connection with the bankers of New York and the railways, prepared a plan for taking care of that particular investment in additions and betterments, and we do not know as yet whether the plan will be successful or not; but if it is, it will provide for $372,000,000 of the billion and a half to which I referred.

The administration has loaned to the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad and to the Boston & Maine Railroad $68,000,000. The loan to the Boston & Maine may not be entirely complete as yet—I am not sure about that—but if not, it will be completed, I assume. This was not for expending in additions and betterments, but was for the purpose of taking up what is known as capital obligations of these two companies in a process of reorganization which has been going on in New England for some time.

If what is known as the equipment-trust venture does not materialize then the United States will have to fund for the railways, under this bill, for 10 years, $920,000,000, or in that neighborhood. And there still remains due from the railroads $212,000,000, or thereabouts, for which under this bill the railways are to execute their demand notes to the Government at 6 per cent interest.

I wish all Senators would examine the statements of account found in the report upon this bill. There are two statements which upon their faces at any rate are not entirely consistent. I do not profess to be an accurate interpreter of intricate bookkeeping, and therefore I do not fully understand them; but I understand these points to which I have referred. But upon the basis that I have given you—and here I answer the question of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]—Congress must appropriate at least $625,000,000.

Mr. KING. More than that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think more will be required, probably, in this contingency. What I have said heretofore does not deal with what is known as the working capital. When the railroads were taken over by the Government I think the thought of all who were familiar with the bill at that time was that simply the physical property was to be taken over. But, in fact, the Government took over the physical property and all of the money as well—that is, the balances in the hands of banks and agents and the balances in the hands of conductors and all who collected money on behalf of the railways.

If we have to restore that money, if we can not turn back the railways to their owners, the railways accepting these current accounts as the equivalent of the accounts taken over originally on the 1st of January, 1918, then we will have to appropriate about $330,000,000 more.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says that the railroads would owe us in the neighborhood of $600,000,000, and that we have to appropriate $600,000,000 more in round numbers to carry out the present plan.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg pardon. I did not say the railroads would owe us that much. They will not owe us anything. There will be a loss of $650,000,000 that the railroads are not obliged to pay.

Mr. McKELLAR. Take what they owe us now, what security has the Government for the amounts owed? Take especially the $68,000,000 that have been advanced to the Boston & Maine and the New York, New Haven & Hartford. What kind of security has the Government for those amounts, and what kind of security will we get for the $600,000,000 that we are to advance them in the future?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not able to answer that question accurately. I only know that in advancing these sums to the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad and to the Boston & Maine Railroad, if that transaction has been completed, the Government took from those companies what it regarded as fair security for the advances, but just what kind of evidences the Government has of that indebtedness I do not know.

With regard to the security which the Government shall take under the funding operations of the bill, I think I can more accurately answer the Senator from Tennessee by reading section 2, as follows:

> The indebtedness of any carrier corporation to the United States, existing at the time Federal control is relinquished, incurred for additions or betterments made during Federal control, or for advances made by the United States or incurred to pay off any carrier's indebtedness properly chargeable to capital account, shall, at the request of the carrier, be extended for a period of 10 years, or a shorter period, at the option of the carrier, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum payable semiannually on the 1st days of January and July of each year. Said indebtedness shall be evidenced, if practicable, by the first-mortgage bonds of the carrier; but if this is impracticable, then in such form as shall be prescribed by the President.

It is wholly beyond our power to prescribe just what security shall be taken by the President, because the conditions and the financial situation of the several carriers differ so widely. Some of the carriers may issue first-mortgage bonds to secure this indebtedness, some of them may have no first-mortgage bonds to issue, and therefore it is the thought of the committee that we must give to the President the widest discretion in that respect, believing that he will do all that can be done to protect the interests of the United States.

I now come to answer a question propounded by a Senator upon the other side of the Chamber with regard to the payment of this indebtedness so far as possible by the railroads. Senators will remember that I have said that one and one-half billion dollars of these advances at least have been made for additions and betterments—that is, for property account, for expenditures that are ordinarily charged to capital account. There is no railway in the world and no other enterprise in the world which can pay its capital debt from current income.

These companies have been absolutely unable, of course, to borrow money within the last two years. The Government probably would not have permitted the companies to borrow money, even had they had any credit; but with the Government in possession of all their property and receiving all their revenues, of course all the additions and betterments that have been made to the properties must either have been made out of some surplus which the companies had before or must have been made from advances by the Government. If the Government had not been in possession, it is quite likely that the railroad companies could have issued securities on 20 or 25 or 50 years' time, and thus made the very improvements which were constructed out of the advances made by the Government.

It is, of course, obvious that when the roads are returned to their owners there can not be retained by the Government the sums which are necessary to pay interest upon their bonds and other fixed charges. To do so would be to violate the standard contract to which I have already referred. Aside from that, if it were attempted and these roads were returned to their owners after deducting all that the Government owes to them for compensation, they could not operate their properties for a single month. Therefore it becomes necessary, as I view it, for the Government to do for them what they might have done for themselves if the Government had not been in possession and in operation of the railroads.

The provisions of the bill with regard to refunding are, I believe, perfectly definite and easily understood, but I think it is only fair to say that the bill before the Senate provides for a larger refunding operation than the bill which passed the House.

In other words, the bill which passed the House requires a larger application of the sums due to the railway companies by the Government than does the bill reported by your committee. All that I can say on that point is that after very careful consideration it was the belief of the members of the committee that if successful private operation is to be expected, the Government must carry some large part of these advances for capital until the railway companies are able, if they are ever able, to refund them at a lower rate of interest and in that way discharge or liquidate the Government debt.

I shall be glad at any time to answer any question which may occur to any Senator with respect to this accounting.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Senator said he did not want to be interrupted except on the subject under discussion. I merely wish to ask him if later on he will discuss the relation of the short lines to the Government?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, yes.

Mr. CURTIS. I shall want to ask some questions about that when the Senator reaches that subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall be very glad to consider that, because it has been a matter of deep concern in the minds of the members of the committee throughout the entire consideration of the bill.

In closing this part of the review I may say that the bill repeals the act of March 21, 1918, and reserves to the President full right to adjust and settle all accounts according to the terms of that bill or the existing law. I think it does this in so comprehensive a way that there will be no one who will doubt the power of the President to carry on the settlement under the terms of the bill.

The difference between the House bill and this bill in that respect is that the House bill does not repeal the act of March 21, 1918, but attempts to limit its operation in the future to the work of adjustment and settlement, whereas our bill repeals that act and preserves those rights and remedies which, in the opinion of the members of the committee, were necessary in order to come to a full and complete settlement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before the Senator leaves that branch of the subject will he state whether I have the correct idea that under the experience of the Government in operating the railroads during this period of time, the net result will be that it will have cost us between $600,000,000 and $700,000,000 in losses, and in addition to that the Government will have become a creditor of these railroads to a large extent. I do not recall the amount.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the amount of the credit?

Mr. CUMMINS. The total amount in all forms is $1,206,000,000, in round numbers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Government will be a creditor of the railroads to the extent of $1,200,000,000——

Mr. CUMMINS. A little more than that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And a loss in operating them of between $600,000,000 and $700,000,000?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is about the figure. I may say, however, in further explanation of that, that if this funding operation carried under the equipment trust is successful, the Government will get $225,000,000 of money in that operation, which would tend to reduce this credit by that amount.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. EDGE. In this connection that does not contemplate, as I have followed the Senator's explanation, the possible additional indebtedness on the part of the Government for replacement?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it does not.

Mr. EDGE. In other words, placing the railroads back in the same condition they were in when taken over by the Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. It includes an item of depreciation which, of course, is capable of computation, but it does not include the claims that a particular railroad company may make against the Government growing out of a return of property in an alleged poorer condition than when taken over.

Mr. EDGE. That is the point I was making.

Mr. CUMMINS. Those claims are not included in this bill at all.

Mr. EDGE. May I ask the Senator if those claims have in any way been filed?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I think not.

Mr. EDGE. Is there any way now to estimate the possible amount of such claims?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not. It is assumed that when we are ready to return the railroads to their owners, there will be an inspection or an examination which will have some bearing upon that question. From all that I can learn, and that is simply from casual and unofficial conversations with those who are interested in the matter, there are some railroads which will be returned in better condition than when the Government took them, and there will be other railroads which will be in worse condition than when the Government took them. I anticipate 25 years of litigation before those disputed questions are fully determined, and I would not conjecture the outcome of the controversy.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. Can the Senator give us some reason for this great loss of money in the short time the Government has been operating the railroads? Were the railroads running behind to this extent before we took them over?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will give the Senator the reason from my standpoint in a moment. That is rather a broad and very pertinent question. Any Senator has a right to ask it, but, after all, the answer depends upon individual opinion.

The policy adopted by the committee—and I am passing now to the permanent legislation which the committee is proposing for the regulation of our common carriers for the future——

Mr. KING. Before the Senator passes to that may I ask him a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that I understood the answer of the Senator to the question propounded by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], but as I hurriedly figure the matter in my head, it is this: That the Government of the United States will be required to appropriate, first and last, to the railroads approximately $1,800,000,000 or $1,900,000,000; they will get in return $1,250,000,000 of railroad securities, if the railroads may give securities; and that we will be out then approximately $650,000,000. Then, of course, if those securities are valueless we will be out the amount of the securities.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Utah has stated the account with fair accuracy. I do not want, however, to be understood as confirming the exact number of dollars which he has named.

Mr. KING. I have not attempted to state that myself.

Mr. CUMMINS. But if everything the railroad companies owe to the Government shall be paid, and if there are no claims for returning the property in poorer condition than when received, the people of this country will have lost in the operation of two years something like $650,000,000.

Mr. KING. Just one other question, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was interested when the Senator stated that there were unliquidated claims by the railroad companies for damages resulting from the depreciation in value of the railroads. I know of a number of railroads that unquestionably will be left in a very deplorable condition; that is to say, they will have run down; there is no doubt that the Government has neglected those roads and has failed to expend upon them what it should have expended in order to keep them up to an average standard that had been maintained theretofore.

The question I was going to ask was this: Did not the committee consider some plan—and I am not sure how it could be worked out—by which, instead of having 25 years of litigation and controversy over the depreciation the question could be settled immediately?

Did the committee consider the plan of providing some tribunal before which the claims should immediately be presented? The Senator will see that if years go by before a lawsuit shall be tried, the witnesses available for defense by the Government will be dead or scattered, so that it will be impossible for the Government to resist many claims which may be extortionate. It seems to me that Congress ought to provide some instrumentality that may immediately take up the consideration of these claims and the roads be required to file within a certain time itemized statements, bills of particulars, of the damages which they claim, and have the matter remitted to the Court of Claims or to some tribunal that has power to pass upon such claims.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the act of 1918 provides for such tribunals. There is not any difficulty about the tribunals. The railroads, of course, will make their claims against the Government, and if they are unable to settle with the President or with the railroad administration, then they will resort to the courts; it is their only remedy; and we do not lack courts to settle the matter. But I only say, being guided or informed by long experience, and as the Senator himself will know, that it is quite likely that a good part of a quarter of a century will pass before these claims are entirely determined.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. In the Senator's bill is there any plan by which the railroads may be compelled to reimburse the United States for the money the Government has advanced to them?

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly; the act of 1918 provides for that in the most direct terms. There is no question that the railroad companies are liable to the Government for those advances.

Mr. NELSON. But is the obligation not in the nature of a personal liability? Is the Government of the United States given in this legislation, or in any other legislation, any lien on the railroad properties for its advances?

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator mean in the act of 1918 or in this act?

Mr. NELSON. Has the Government any lien on the property which it could enforce, supposing the carrier refused to comply with the demand of the Government?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it has, except in so far as the equipment is concerned. The Government owns the equipment, and it has all the rights of an owner in that respect.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I understand the bill provides that the long-term notes shall be secured by first-mortgage bonds on the property of the carrier.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Minnesota, however, was inquiring about what lien, if any, the Government now has.

Mr. STANLEY. I thought the Senator spoke of securities to be issued.

Mr. CUMMINS. This bill provides that so far as the advances for betterments and additions are concerned they shall be evidenced by first-mortgage bonds, if practicable; and, if not practicable, then by such securities as the President may prescribe.

Mr. NELSON. But suppose the railroads decline to give such bonds, what then? How can the obligations be enforced?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is but one way, and that is to sue the railroad companies to recover the money. The Government will be compelled to resort to the same remedies for the enforcement of a debt that an individual must avail himself of.

Mr. NELSON. One other suggestion: Would it not be a good plan in this legislation to declare that the Government shall have an enforceable lien on these properties for its reimbursement?

Mr. CUMMINS. That may be. I doubt, however, whether we could at this time provide that this indebtedness shall be a lien upon the property of the railroad companies prior to the liens already established. I think not.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me further, that may be true, but, nevertheless, ought we not to provide that the Government shall have a lien at least subsequent to the existing liens on the roads?

Mr. CUMMINS. It might be very well to consider that question. The committee has assumed that the Government would get from the railroad companies before the properties were returned to them all the security which they are capable of giving, and I think that is the manner in which the settlement will take place.

I ought to say that there is another phase of this matter which I believe Senators should bear in mind. I remarked that on the 1st of January, 1918, the President took possession of all the railroads in the United States. On the 1st of July, without physically interfering with many of them, he returned 700 or 800 of the roads to their owners. The claims which I have mentioned do not include the claims of those companies. The short-line railroads of the country are all claiming that the Government shall stand responsible for the losses which occurred during the six months in which the Government had nominal possession of their properties on account of the diversion of traffic, the destruction of their business, and the disintegration and disorganization of their entire operating and managing force. I do not know what those claims may aggregate. It makes me shudder a little when I look forward to what may be insisted upon against the Government in the next few years.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Will those claims include alleged losses for the taking away from those roads of business and diverting it to other lines under Government control?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have heard of some such claims being made.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think they would be valid claims?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not believe that the diversion of traffic would constitute a good claim against the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I assume that the Government when it operated the roads used those roads that it could most effectively coordinate, and excluded those which in managing the entire system were less useful, some of which perhaps were entirely useless.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was never able to ascertain from my survey of the situation just what actuated the Railroad Administration in dealing as it did with some of the short-line railroads. I think that in all the history of our relations to the railways there never was injustice that was comparable with the injustice which the Government has inflicted upon some of the weak short lines of railroad, barely able to sustain themselves in normal times and utterly unable to maintain themselves during the last two years. We have done precisely what I stood here and said we would do—we have paid to the big railroads a compensation so excessive as to shock the moral sense of mankind and we have permitted the weaker railroads, which are just as necessary for the transportation of the United States as are the stronger ones, although not in the same degree, to struggle through these two years in a way that creates the only sympathy I have ever felt toward railway management. There are so many instances in which the superior force of the Railroad Administration, with its monopoly of all the influences of the land, has exerted against the shorter, weaker lines that I could not enumerate them if I were to stand here all the remainder of the afternoon. As I replied to the Senator from Kansas, one of the prominent motives in the minds of all the members of the committee in the construction of this bill has been to do tardy and, I fear, incomplete justice to these roads that have been so severely discriminated against in the last two years. But we will come to that with more detail later on.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him once more?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. In connection with the statement which the Senator has just made, another suggestion occurred to me: The Senator has intimated that some of the strong roads, as he calls them, and properly so, earned more than was necessary to enable them to pay their fixed charges and dividends. What becomes of that surplus in the case of the powerful roads which really, during the Government administration, earned more than they should have earned? What becomes of that fund?

Mr. CUMMINS. Possibly the Senator from Minnesota did not hear me clearly. What I said was that we agreed to pay some of these strong roads a great deal more than we should have agreed to pay them.

Mr. NELSON. Oh!

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not say that they earned, during the two years that the Government has been in possession of them, more than they should have earned; but that is also true.

Mr. NELSON. But I mean, did they not, as a matter of fact, earn more than their dividends and fixed charges?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; but there are only a few of them that earned more than we had agreed to pay them for compensation. There are a few roads in the country that have during the two years earned more than the compensation which we agreed to pay them.

Mr. NELSON. What becomes of that surplus?

Mr. CUMMINS. That becomes the property of the Government.

Mr. NELSON. It belongs to the Federal Government?

Mr. CUMMINS. Under the act of March 21, 1918.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss at any length the merits of private operation as compared with public operation. I have already said that the operation of a system of railways or a system of transportation is a proper governmental function, and that it is only a question of how the people of the country can be best and most efficiently served. I would adopt in a moment public ownership and public operation as entirely within the legitimate sphere of organized society if I believed that the people would thereby secure better, more adequate, and cheaper transportation. I do not intend to enter into the discussion of the various considerations which ought to weigh with every thinking man upon that subject, because the committee was so nearly unanimous upon that proposal that it is unnecessary for me to defend its position in that regard. I only pause to say that I believe that the great majority of the people of the United States, in view of the experience of the last two years, do not desire that public operation shall be continued, and do desire that these properties shall be returned to their owners under such strict supervision and regulation as will insure justice at once to the owners of the properties and to the public as well.

I have it in my mind, however, to say one or two things with regard to a claim that is made and that you hear everywhere, namely, that Government ownership and operation has not had a fair trial during the last two years, and that the results which I have already given you of the operation for these two years can not be assumed to be the fair or necessary results of Government operation.

Whatever may be the merits of Government operation, I feel no hesitation in saying that the trial of the last two years in the United States has been the fairest trial to which that form of regulation could be submitted. The Government has had every possible advantage in demonstrating efficiency in operation. First, the volume of the traffic of 1918 was substantially the same as the volume of the traffic in 1917, and in 1919 that volume had been not greatly diminished. The Government has had the advantage of absolute authority. It has had no interfering or embarrassing conflicts with any department of the Government. The Director General, together with those officers who have been appointed to assist him in the administration, has been supreme; and I say again that it is not in my heart to criticize the action of the Director General, save in one or two respects that may become material a little later on; but I now want to impress upon those who believe in Government operation that the Director General has been master of the whole situation. It was for him, and him only, to say what unification should take place. It was for him, and for him only, to declare upon what routes traffic should be moved. There was no one to dispute his authority, no one to question his decisions, and if Government operation could have a fairer opportunity to demonstrate its efficiency I can not imagine it. The Director General had complete authority over rates. We dispossessed the Interstate Commerce Commission of all authority over the subject when we transferred these properties to the President of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator desire us to understand that if the Government had not taken over the railroads, but had permitted them to remain in private ownership and private operation, they would have gotten through the war without any trouble and we would have had none of the difficulties that we now have?

Mr. CUMMINS. In my opinion they would have had very much less trouble than we have had, so far as losses are concerned. I am now speaking of the cheapness of transportation. Of course, if the people of the country desire to pay the price, Government operation is entirely feasible. There is nothing that stands in its way if the people are willing to pay the cost.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not seeking now to get into an argument with the Senator as to either one of these systems, but I want to get all the light I can as to what each system would have to contend with under the conditions of the last two years. Does the Senator think that if we had the experience to go through again and we had the question up as to whether we ought to authorize the taking over of the railroads we ought to refuse to do it and force them to operate under private ownership?

Mr. CUMMINS. There was one thing gained in public operation, and but one, in my opinion, and that was the right to move traffic on any line that it was desired to move it on.

Mr. NORRIS. Would we have been able to get through the war and do the work that was done without increasing rates, for instance?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think so.

Mr. NORRIS. So the Senator does not mean to say that the Government's taking over the railroads has been the cause of the increase of railroad rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not said a word about that. I am simply endeavoring to show from my standpoint that we have had a fair trial; that there has been nothing in the condition of the business of the United States during the last two years that rendered it more difficult to give transportation at a fair cost than in normal times.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator if this is not true: The operation of the last two years under Government control and operation is being compared with the operation under private control under normal conditions?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not compared it.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that that is what the Senator is doing.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I am simply saying that Government operation has had a fair trial in the last two years.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, I am not saying that either private operation or Government operation could have gone on doing business at the same rates that were prevailing before the war.

Mr. NORRIS. But if the Senator is going to compare the two systems—and I understood that was what he was doing—he is comparing Government operation under war conditions with private operation under normal conditions.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Government had a great deal better chance under war conditions than the railroad companies had under peace conditions, in my opinion.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I simply wish to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that there were nine months of private operation during the war.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and, as I understand, Mr. President, the reason why we passed the law authorizing the President to take over the railroads was that in those nine months of private operation it was demonstrated that the railroads were breaking down, and that it was an absolute necessity that the Government take them over in order to carry on the war.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to suggest to the Senator that no such thing was demonstrated.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not resist taking over the railroads. No one at that time could resist anything that was proposed in the name of the war. I think we all experienced that. There was not any proposition made in the name of the prosecution of the war so flagrant or so unreasonable but that it received the assent of most of the Members of Congress and a great proportion of the people. But when you ask me and want my real, honest opinion with regard to the matter, it is my judgment that the railroads, at the time the President took them over, were doing better in the movement of traffic than they ever did afterwards. But I do not say—and I do not want anyone to understand that I assert—that the railroads could have continued to do business upon the rates which were then in effect any more than the Government could continue to do business under those rates.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may refer, just in a sentence or two, to the issue raised by the Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Krutschnitt, in his testimony before the Committee on Interstate Commerce in January, said that during the first nine months of Government control and operation the per ton-miles of traffic were very substantially less than they were during the corresponding nine months of the last year of private control; and Mr. Daniel Willard's position, when he appeared before the committee, was that it was not so much the railroads that had broken down in transportation as it was our ocean transportation, and that the glutting of the lines in the East was often due in part to the fact that orders would come to have grain sent to the ports for the purpose of being put in the ships, and when the ships were partially loaded a new order would come requiring the grain to be unloaded for the purpose of shipping munitions, and that at that time there were no proper warehouses and no proper places of storage in the East to accommodate this traffic.

Again, under the priority rule which was adopted by Congress, when it was expected that priorities would only be given to such merchandise as was necessary for war purposes, a number of these departments were giving cards which would indicate priority of shipment by the dozens, if not by the hundreds, to different manufacturing plants, so that this condition was brought about—that on the Pennsylvania system 85 per cent of the traffic was being shipped under priority orders. That was, in part, what caused the glutting of the railroads in the eastern territory.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, that all indicates incompetency in the management, whether it is under Government control or private control. I think in a general way the country became aware of these priority shipments, as they were called. I am only interested in having a comparison, if it is made, on an absolutely fair basis. I am not defending or trying to defend a great many things that were done by the Railroad Administration when they first took the roads over. It seemed to me that a great many things showed a great deal of incompetency. But is it not true that after the continued control by the Government a great many of the things that interfered with the proper management of the roads were remedied? Is it not true that they are now being operated upon a much more efficient basis than they were for the first six or nine months or year when they were taken over?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not certain about that. Nor am I very much concerned about it, so far as the present point is concerned. I started out by saying that I did not intend to discuss the merits of Government operation as compared with private operation. I do not intend to institute any comparison. All that I am contending for at this moment is that the history of the last two years furnishes a fair test of Government operation, and whoever desires to compare hereafter the results of the last two years with those of former years will have at least, if it is of any benefit, the benefit of my observations with regard to the fairness of the test.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me the Senator's test, his yardstick, is not fair. I presume nearly every person who believes in Government ownership would be opposed fundamentally to the kind of Government control that we have had in the last two years. At least as I understand those who favor Government ownership, they would be the last persons to propose the system that was put into effect as a war measure, which put the railroads under the control of an executive Cabinet officer, making it possible for them at once to be put into politics as a football. It is always offered as the greatest objection, and I think it is a great objection, to Government ownership that they get into politics. Those who believe in Government operation of railroads would themselves be the last to advocate the operation of the railroads by a Cabinet officer of any administration or to put them in the hands of any President or any other political force.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that, Mr. President. I know that those who are in favor of Government ownership and operation would not choose the organization which has been operating the roads for the last two years as the ideal organization. Nevertheless it is my judgment that the organization we have had for the last two years, assuming its honesty, as I do assume it, was better qualified, more competent to operate the railroads of the United States than the organization which is suggested in the question put by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I do not think it is an ideal organization, because it has too much arbitrary power, I think. But the very moment you discard or eliminate some of these autocratic and arbitrary powers, that very moment you decrease the efficiency of the organization and increase the expense of the operation. I, for one, believe that Mr. McAdoo, and following him Mr. Hines, and especially Mr. Hines, have done the very best that could be done with these properties. I think they have operated the properties just as cheaply as they could be operated, barring the increase in wages, to which I will come in a moment. While they have done a great many things that I would not have done if I had been in their place, yet no one can question the energy and the ability with which the railroad operations have been carried on.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. I understand the present control has had the same power and all the power that could have been vested in a board, nonpartisan or otherwise, to absolutely control the traffic during these two years.

Mr. CUMMINS. Surely. Moreover, I have given rather close study to the Railroad Administration during the last two years, and, in so far as I know, nothing has been done for political effect. I do not believe that any organization prepared or created for the purpose of managing the railroads could be farther removed from political activities than the organization which we have seen.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think the Senator wants to be diverted from his bill, nor do I want to divert him, and get him off into a side line; but I do not want to let that statement go unchallenged. I simply want to say that from my observation, limited as it has been, I have seen what to me looked like a whole lot of politics, and lots of things done when there was nothing else in it but politics, in the management of the roads.

Mr. CUMMINS. If so, they have escaped my observation. I have not observed that characteristic in the management of our railroads.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have heard it advanced that Government ownership and operation was not subjected to a fair trial in the last two years for the reason that the actual management in the field, if not in the headquarters at Washington, was intrusted to men who had occupied similar positions with the roads of the country; that the manager of the railroad was appointed Federal manager, and he came to the duties of his position with all the prejudices and predilections against Government ownership which he had acquired through years of training and experience in the management of roads operated by private corporations, and that while perhaps there was nothing in the nature of a conspiracy to depreciate in the public mind the policy of Government ownership, yet there was no disposition evinced to make it a grand success and to secure thus the approval of the general policy in the public mind. I thought when the Senator was going to discuss the fairness of the trial he would want to say something on that point, and I should be very glad to have an expression of his views.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have heard that suggested many times. If there has been a spirit or motive of that kind, in my judgment it has been with those who have been excluded from the active management of the railroad properties. It is true, and necessarily true, that the regional directors were chosen from the class ordinarily known as railway executives. It would not have been possible to have chosen them from any other class, and I firmly believe that these regional directors, these superintendents, and all the way down the list of employees, have been faithful and loyal and have done all they could do to secure an efficient and economic management of the properties committed to their care. However, the Government during this period has had advantage of something which it can never again enjoy. It has had the advantage of the war loyalty. All the men engaged in the operation of these railways, from regional directors to section hands, have felt the spirit which fortunately has moved all Americans and they have worked for the Government, as I view it, with a fidelity and with an earnestness which you will never observe in times of peace. That is another of the advantages which I think the Government has had during the past two years.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield further to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have also heard the suggestion that the railroad operatives who appear now to be wedded to the principle of Government ownership of railroads, and are advocating energetically what is known as the Plumb plan, did not exhibit, during the past two years, that spirit of desire to make the system and policy a success which might be expected of them; but by reason of a less energetic discharge of the duties of their various stations the cost of operation and the cost of repair and the cost of construction were substantially increased. What does the Senator say on that aspect of the question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can not accept that conclusion. Just now, of course, every railroad union in the country is busily engaged in passing resolutions denouncing me. I suppose that I have concentrated against me now more bitter hostility on the part of the railway unions of the United States than any man who has hitherto appeared, simply because I stand for certain provisions in this bill. That, however, does not alienate my confidence in them. I believe the railway men of the United States are intelligent; I believe they have been and are loyal; I believe they have been and are faithful; and nothing which may have occurred with respect to their adhesion to a certain plan for the regulation and operation of our railroads has, in my judgment, affected in the least degree their desire and their determination to render the best service possible in the transportation of the country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I have heard that there are some 144,000 more employees under Government operation of the roads, with a mileage much less than that operated under private ownership, than there were employees during the period of private ownership, and also that it requires about—my recollection is not clear, but I think 127 men now to do the work of 110 men under private ownership.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will remark upon that in just a moment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Before the Senator leaves the other point——

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not left it yet, but I shall be very glad to have the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As I understood the question of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], he indicated that reports had gotten out that the men generally were not doing their best under existing management for the reason that they wanted some other plan. My understanding is and my correspondence at all times shows that the men generally want to continue the present method of Government control until Government ownership shall be attained. Does it not stand to reason that the hundreds of thousands of men who are in the employ of the Government and desiring the present system continued and believing that it is perhaps the first step toward Government ownership would be induced to do the best they could to make a success of the present operation rather than to destroy it?

Mr. CUMMINS. Inasmuch as the plan known as the Plumb plan has been mentioned, it ought to be remarked that the Plumb plan is not Government operation; it is Government ownership. But there is nothing in common between what we know as Government ownership and operation and the Plumb plan except in ownership of the property by the Government. Whatever may be the merit of Government ownership and operation carried on through the ordinary instrumentalities of organized society, I want no one to confound that plan for furnishing transportation to the people of the country and the plan proposed by the men to whim the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has referred. The plan to which he has referred is the operation of the properties through a class and not through the instrumentalities of the Government.

I repeat that I believe that the Government has had a greater advantage in the last two years than it can ever again have save in time of war for the operation of railroad properties. I am not saying whether it ought to be continued or whether it ought not to be continued, but I am dispelling, if I can, the illusion that the railroads of this country have been operated during the last two years under great disadvantages. They have not. They have been operated under great advantages.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I ask the Senator a question right there? Does he not think about 50 per cent of the railroads were saved from bankruptcy or insolvency by the coming on of the war?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not. I think that if the revenues of the railroad companies had not been increased as the prices of materials and wages rose, all of them would have been in bankruptcy, but I assume that the revenues would have been increased with the railroads in the hands of the private corporations so far as necessary just as they have been increased with the railroads in the hands of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am asking about the status before the war. What was the proportion of railroads before the war broke out—and when I say that I do not mean before we went into the war, but before the European war broke out—which were earning less than 3 per cent?

Mr. CUMMINS. Possibly 20 per cent; not more than that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then 20 per cent of them were menaced with insolvency?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes. Twenty per cent of them will always be in bankruptcy until we change our method of rate regulation, as I shall show before I have finished my explanation of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say, coming from myself, that I am of the opinion that if the war in Europe had not occurred a majority of the railroads in the United States would have been in the hands of receivers right now.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is pretty difficult to tell what would have been if something had not happened that did happen. But I assert, or at least it is my judgment, that a very small part of the railroads of the country would have been in bankruptcy or in the hands of receivers under the conditions named by the Senator from Mississippi.

Another thing that the Government had which it can not again have save in time of war is this: It had a spirit on the part of the people to endure and submit to all kinds of inconveniences simply because they were patriotic and did not want to protest against some of the shortcomings of the Railroad Administration. You will not experience that if you institute Government ownership in times of peace.

I can not but think that all these things taken together must convince anyone that the Government has had a fair and reasonable opportunity to test the economy and the efficiency of Government operation. I do not intend to institute a comparison now between the years before and these two years, but I want it done, if it is done, upon the assumption that the Government has had a fair chance.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator think that if protests had been made, which he says for patriotic reasons were not made, it would have improved the control of the railroads? If something was wrong and some one had protested against it or called attention to it, it probably would have brought about a remedy.

Mr. CUMMINS. If a remedy were possible, I think it might.

Mr. NORRIS. If a remedy were not possible, then we would assume there would be no complaint made, but I understand the Senator to say the Government had the advantage, due to the fact that people for patriotic reasons refused to complain when things were wrong.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is my judgment.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that would have the opposite effect from what the Senator thinks it did have. If men complain when something is wrong, it has a tendency to right the wrong.

Mr. CUMMINS. If I may be permitted the remark, it seems to me the Senator is rather hypercritical. There are some protests which do bring about reform and remedy. There are other protests which do not. In a broad, big way the people of the country were willing to submit to inconveniences during the war which they will not submit to during times of peace—shortage of cars, failure in the transportation of coal or of grain. The people would submit to things in time of war without rebellion that they would insist upon having remedied in time of peace. To be remedied required additional expenditures of money, additional motive power, additional cars, and additional facilities of all kinds.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question there?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. A shortage of cars does not necessarily come about because there are not enough cars. Shortage of cars might come about because the person who had charge was not properly distributing what he had. A complaint in that case would bring about a remedy, whereas for patriotic reasons, as the Senator says, persons might submit and make no complaint and thus help to make the management inefficient.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, if the Senator from Nebraska really believes that there was serious inefficiency in the operation of our railroads and attributes that to the character of the organization, nothing that I could say would remove that impression from his mind. I am of the opinion that while the organization was not perfect, I would not give that much power to any man if I could help it. I protested against the extent of power at the time the bill was passed, but no one could assert successfully, I think, that in a given time the possession of that power contributed to inefficiency. On the contrary, I think it contributed to a certain efficiency in securing the largest volume of transportation possible with the facilities at hand.

Now, Mr. President, I want to answer the question propounded, I think, by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] or the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. Notwithstanding these advantages which I have enumerated, and which have greater or less weight in determining the comparison, and with practically the same volume of business, rates have been raised yielding additional revenues $200,000,000 in excess of the increase of wages for a like number of men, and still the loss for two years is from $650,000,000 to $750,000,000. I emphasize, the same number of men.

That brings me to comment upon the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. The administration has increased the number of men employed to render the same service—that is, to move a like volume of traffic—194,000. I want to refer to the figures in order to be sure that I am right, because it is a somewhat startling statement.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the number of the increase is 190,500.

Mr. CUMMINS. My recollection was that it was 194,000; that is, in July, 1919, there were 194,000 more men employed rendering transportation service in the United States than were employed by the railroad companies in December, 1917. I am not just now questioning the propriety or the wisdom of that; but in some way or other, mainly by shortening hours of service—and we might as well look the matter squarely in the face—the number of men required to serve the people of the country in transportation has been increased by 190,000 or 194,000 men.

The rates have been increased so that in 1918, upon practically the same volume of traffic, the gross revenues or operating revenues of the railway companies for the year, if the rates had been in force during the whole year, would have been $1,100,000,000 more than the gross revenues for the year 1917. The outcome is rather disheartening, rather startling.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. It is true that the so-called eight-hour law was passed, and I favored it then and favor it now. The Senator has stated the increase in the number of men to be 190,000 plus. Is the Senator advised to what extent these men continue to work in excess of eight hours?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not advised; I do not believe that there is information of that kind at hand, although I presume it could be procured. The Senator from Ohio, of course, is speaking of the overtime?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not that information. I have the number of hours which have been worked during the years 1918 and 1919; I have also the wages that have been paid. I wish to remark here that I think the complaint with regard to the administration increasing the wages of the railway men is absolutely unfounded. I do not believe the railway men of the United States are now receiving what they ought to receive in comparison with the compensation paid in other employments of the same general character. There have been some absurd adjustments made in reclassifications; but, so far as the general level of the compensation of railway men is concerned, it is not excessive, and I very much doubt whether it is now compensatory in comparison with the cost of commodities which the men must buy in order to sustain life. I want to assert in the strongest possible way that all this furore with regard to an increase of wages, generally speaking, is but vapor; it has no foundation whatever. While some railway men, on account of mistakes in classification, are receiving a great deal more than they ought to receive, the general average of advance is not to exceed 42 per cent; and if anyone can believe that an advance in a broad, general way of 40 per cent is inordinate, in view of the rising cost of living, he has a strange mind.

Mr. President, I now pass to another question, namely, the return of these properties to their owners and the conditions under which they ought to be returned. You will all agree with me that it is a perfectly idle ceremony to return the railroads to their owners unless they can successfully operate them.

It would be absurd for the Government to restore these properties to the railroad corporations which formerly owned them unless the Government believed at least that those corporations could resume the operation of the railroads and render to the people of the country the service which, of course, must be rendered if our commerce is to be sustained.

One of these conditions is ability to borrow money. No matter what we may think with regard to the wrongs which have been done in the past by the railroad companies—and there is a chapter of misdeeds which is not only very interesting to all of us but which merits and always receives complete and emphatic condemnation—the railroads if they are to be returned must be able to borrow money, because even if the Government carries a billion dollars of their obligations for 10 years, as it must, in my judgment—or some such amount as that—the railroads must borrow another billion dollars, or some such large sum, in the coming year.

The people of this country do not stand still; their business is developing; their commerce is growing; their demand for transportation facilities increases with every week and every month, and, of course, either the railway corporations or the Government must respond to that demand. When the railways are returned and the railway companies seek to borrow money, it must be a voluntary transaction. The men who have money to invest will not contribute it to railroad enterprises unless they are satisfied, first, of the safety of the investmnt, and, second, of a reasonable return upon the money which they thus contribute. We can not compel men to invest money in railway enterprises, and therefore what we do must be, in our judgment, the thing which will enable the railway corporations, honestly managed, honestly financed, to borrow the money necessary, first, to pay their maturing obligations, and, second, to enlarge the facilities which they now have and which are used for transportation. If we are not willing to do that, it is vastly better not to return the properties at all.

If we return these properties feeling that within the next two months or three months or six months or a year the Government must again take them and resume their operation, it would be infinitely better, cheaper, and more in the interest of all the people not to return them at all. So when you come to consider the terms of this bill I hope you will all bear in mind that the suggestion I have just made is one of the considerations which the committee had constantly in view—a return of the properties to the companies which own them under such conditions as would enable these companies to operate them successfully and, in order to do that, to borrow the money necessary, sometimes for maintenance, but generally for enlargements and additions.

I now approach what I regard as the central thought of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves the subject he has been discussing——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. It may be that the Senator intends to discuss later the question I have in mind; and, if he does, I will not press the question now; but does the bill provide for a method of raising the funds which the railroads are going to need—the billion dollars of which the Senator speaks?

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not; that is, not directly. It does not undertake any obligation upon the part of the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. How are the railroads going to be able to borrow the money?

Mr. CUMMINS. As I remarked, men who have money to invest—and fortunately there are a great many such men in the United States—will invest their money in an enterprise in which the ultimate return of their capital is fairly well assured, and in which the yearly return or interest is fairly adequate.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the only provision in this bill that answers the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I was trying to find out whether the bill made any provision that would enable the roads when they were turned back to borrow the money which the Senator says is going to be necessary.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope so. If it does not, it ought to be rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator intend to discuss that provision of the bill later?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do intend to discuss it.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I will reserve my questions.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, private operation of railways can not be continued as a permanent policy unless there is a radical change in our system of regualtion. There is but one course which will insure successful private operation. Our Interstate Commerce Commission has been a faithful, intelligent body of men. They have made mistakes now and then, which I have not hesitated to criticize; but, on the whole, I think they have attempted to do their duty as they have seen their duty. It has been, however, utterly impossible for the Interstate Commerce Commission to establish a body of rates in the United States that would enable the railway systems of the Nation to maintain themselves. It has been utterly impossible for any body of men to make a system of rates that will sustain the weaker railroads of the country without giving to the stronger railroads an income excessive and intolerable in its extent; and there lies the great, fundamental obstacle in our system of rate making. The Interstate Commerce Commission can no more give to each railway of the United States the return to which it is fairly entitled than it can annihilate distance or overcome any other law of nature; and for that reason, when the Government took possession of the railroads, some of the railroads were earning enormous and excessive incomes, while other railroads were struggling against adversity, and utterly incapable of rendering to their communities the service to which those communities were fairly entitled; and it was obvious, I think, to the students of the subject, long before the Government took possession, that we must adopt some plan that would remove this inherent, fundamental difficulty.

I give some instances. I take now the test period for the basis of my observations. The test period, as you all know, was the three years before the 1st of July, 1917; and I must necessarily accept the investment account as another of the bases. The property investment account of the various railroads is an account kept since 1907 under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and before that without any supervision, but which is supposed to reflect the actual investment in money in the railway properties. The investment account is grossly, flagrantly wrong in many cases, as we all know. It has been so declared by the Interstate Commerce Commission in many of its decisions; but it is the only thing that for the purpose of this comparison I can assume, and it is the assumption which was accepted in the act of 1918.

Upon the basis of the investment account the average annual net operating income of the New York Central road during the three years was 6.09 per cent; of the Pennsylvania Co., 6.26 per cent. Now, get this straight, because I do not want to be misunderstood or misquoted hereafter. This is not upon capitalization, this is upon investment account, and is supposed to represent the entire investment, and in many cases represents a great deal more than the investment. Upon this basis the average annual net operating income of the Pennsylvania Railroad during the three years was 5.36 per cent; Delaware, Lackawanna & Western, 7.54; Erie, 3.56; Baltimore & Ohio, 4.67; Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, 7.02; Chicago & North Western, 6.13; Missouri Pacific, 4.43; Union Pacific, 6.72; Southern Pacific, 4.99; Northern Pacific, 6.27; Great Northern, 6.70; Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe, 6.16; Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, 4.71; Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific, 4.72; Chicago & Great Western, 1.77; Chicago & Alton, 2.64; Western Pacific, 2.28; Colorado Southern, 3.04; Missouri, Kansas & Texas, 2.81; Texas Pacific, 3.76; Wabash, 2.91; Western Maryland, 2.58; New York, New Haven & Hartford, 5.06; Boston & Maine, 4.80; Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton, 1.95; Atlantic Coast Line, 5.76; Seaboard Air Line, 3.68; Southern Railway, 4.12; Louisville & Nashville, 6.32; Illinois Central, 5.48.

In their respective territories these roads are competitive, and must carry traffic at the same rates.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Can the Senator give us any information as to how much this investment account is exaggerated or padded? And let me ask another question in connection with that one. Are there any instances where the investment account is smaller than the facts would warrant?

Mr. CUMMINS. That depends entirely upon one's idea of the basis which should prevail in valuing property. I think there are a great many instances in which the investment accounts are larger than any possible value that could be attributed to the property. I think there are other instances in which, if the courts adopt the rule which has been announced by the Interstate Commerce Commission governing the value of property, the investment account would be found to be very much less than the value of the property.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not asking for a comparison between the investment account and the value of the property. The investment account, as I understand, is supposed to represent the actual money invested in the property. The question I ask the Senator is this: He said himself that a great many of these investment accounts were entirely too large. Can the Senator give us any idea as to the extent to which they have been made too large, and is there any case where the investment account is too small? I do not mean as compared with the value of the property; but are there any cases now where the investment account is less than the money actually invested in the property?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I, of course, have not examined the investment accounts of the various railroads, and I would not have any opportunity to know; but I have the general impression, resulting from reading the opinions of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that there are a great many instances in which the investment account is larger than the actual investment in money. I do not believe that there is any instance in which the investment account is smaller than the actual investment in money, although I am not speaking with knowledge upon that subject.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that there are some cases where the property has been charged down upon the books to a point less than the actual cash invested in the property.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is speaking now of the value of the property.

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, no; less than the actual cash invested in the property.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but what is it that is less than the actual cash invested in the property?

Mr. KELLOGG. The present property investment account on the books of the company.

Mr. NORRIS. If you are keeping an investment account, which would necessarily be the same as the value of the property, whether it was up or down, I can not conceive how, if they honestly keep it, it would not be exactly correct, because, of course, every time any money was put into the property it would be added to the investment account.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know that this is an actual case, for I have not examined that phase of it, but I can easily see how it might be. Suppose there was a foreclosure of a mortgage, and a property on which there had been expended two millions of dollars was bid in, we will say, for a million dollars. The company which bought it in, if it were to follow the rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission, would start out its investment account with $1,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, that would be the only right way to do, would it not? If they had only invested a million dollars, although the property might be worth ten millions, the investment account should only show the investment of a million dollars.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, it ought to show the investment of that owner in the property.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is quite right.

Mr. NORRIS. They would have no right to take advantage of what the investment account of the preceding owner had been.

Mr. CUMMINS. But that might be very much less than the money which had formerly been expended in creating the property.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. STANLEY. How does the total investment account compare with the total capitalization of the companies?

Mr. CUMMINS. The total investment account is about $19,000,000,000, or possibly a little bit less than that. It is between eighteen billions and nineteen billions. The total capitalization, excluding what the Interstate Commerce Commission calls duplicate or intercorporate holdings, is about $18,600,000,000. So, in a broad way, I take it the investment account is something like a billion dollars more than the par of the stocks and bonds in the hands of the public.

But, Mr. President, I did not refer to these several railroads for the purpose of entering into an inquiry as to the correctness or otherwise of the investment accounts.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, one other question. Are we to infer from what the Senator has said that the capitalization of these several roads represents about their actual value?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will not venture an opinion upon the actual value of the railway property. That is a subject upon which there are as many different opinions, almost, as there are men, and especially as there are lawyers. It depends entirely upon the elements which you consider in reaching values.

Mr. President, I brought these figures last mentioned to the attention of the Senate, not for the purpose of an inquiry into the accuracy of the bookkeeping of the railroads or of the commission; I do not affirm that either is accurate; but I do affirm, and these figures show it, that there is a very great disparity in the earning power of these several railways, and I have mentioned the principal railways of the United States.

It is manifest that all these railroads can not live without giving to the stronger of them the advantage of rates which will yield an excessive, indefensible income. I will take, for instance, the Erie in the East, and I will take the Chicago & Great Western in the West. The Chicago & Great Western earned in the test period, I think, 1.7 per cent upon its investment account. It can not live upon it. It can not pay the interest upon its bonds, and it can add nothing to its property in the way of development. What will you do with that railroad? It must continue to serve the people of the community through which it passes. It would be a catastrophe, a calamity, not only locally but nationally, if the road were to be dismantled and abandoned.

What will you do with the Erie, which earned scarcely more upon its investment account? The Pennsylvania can survive, the New York Central can survive, the Delaware & Lackawanna can survive. But what will you do with these roads—and there are a great many of them? I have simply given you instances. What will you do with them in any plan for the return of these properties to their owners?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator contend that the investment account is the proper account upon which the dividends must be earned?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have said it was not.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is just giving an illustration to show that the roads he has enumerated can not live when they can not make more on their investment accounts.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not wish to be so understood. I used the investment account as simply a basis of comparison.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I must answer the interrogatory of the Senator from Nebraska. I do not allege that these are the values of their properties, but they afford a fair basis of comparison. No matter how you might reconstruct the investment account, you can not make the Chicago & Great Western Co. pay upon the rates which now prevail a fair return upon the value of its property.

Mr. NORRIS. That might be.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is what I am asserting.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not been making his basis the value of the property.

Mr. CUMMINS. I must take some basis.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator is taking a basis that he himself admits is not fair.

Mr. CUMMINS. What basis would the Senator from Nebraska suggest?

Mr. NORRIS. I would suggest that if you took a farmer who had lived on a farm for 25 years and gave him a return upon his investment account you would have to double and treble everything that he has to sell. If you applied it to any other man's business, it would not work. It ought to be the same with the railroad. If you will keep on long enough and charge off enough and keep on adding to the investment account, which you will as long as you operate it, you will get it up finally so high that it would be an absolute impossibility for any railroad to live or any business man to live and do business.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not controverting that statement. The Senator from Nebraska refuses, apparently, to consider the point I am trying to make. I do not care what basis you take. I know enough about these properties to know that there is very great disparity in their earning power and that is the only point I am trying to make; and the Senator from Nebraska can not divert me from that conclusion by suggesting that the investment account is not the proper basis. I do not care what the proper basis is. He may take the capitalization, or he may take any form of valuation which he desires, the disparity will be just the same, and either one property is going to get a great deal more than it ought to have or another property will get a great deal less than it ought to have, and that is the conclusion to which I am coming.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator to put me in a wrong light. I have not contended, and do not contend, that there is not this great disparity. I admit it all. But, on the other hand, the Senator is trying to show, it seems to me, that these roads can not live because they are not making enough on their investment accounts, which I do not believe is good logic.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the Senator must know that is not what I have been attempting to establish, if he has paid the least heed to my argument. I am trying to show that there is such a disparity in the conditions under which these roads render their service that either we must give some road a great deal more than it is entitled to get or another road a great deal less than it should have. That is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will read his remarks in the RECORD he will find that he has said that these roads that he has mentioned can not live because they can not live on the per cent they are making on their investment accounts.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I took the property investment account simply in order to furnish a basis for comparison, that is all, saying at the same time that the investment account was not an accurate standard of the value of the property. No one has contended that oftener or more emphatically than I have, and I do not intend to allow the Senator from Nebraska to disparage the argument that I am attempting to make by any such construction upon it.

I repeat, Mr. President, that this table is given just to show the disparity between the earning capacity of these several properties, and they constitute the chief railway properties of the United States; and that if we put a body of rates in effect in any competitive territory, rates which will enable the stronger of the roads to live and earn a sufficient income, no matter what the value of their property may be, and only that, the weaker roads must be abandoned; they can not be sustained; and it was in view of that conclusion that I said originally that the central thought, the underlying purpose, of this bill is to bring about a reorganization of our railroads, so that upon a given body of rates in competitive territory the earnings of the several systems of railroads would be substantially the same, measuring those returns by the values of the properties which are involved. It makes no difference what may be the values involved, the result is just the same. If the railroads of this country were not worth $100, my argument would be just as it is now. My argument is not at all concerned with the values of these properties, but I had to take some basis in order to demonstrate that the earning power of the various roads under a given body of rates was so various that we must find some plan of making the several systems of transportation earn substantially the same with relation to the value of the properties in those systems, in order to at once be fair and just to the public and provide a fair return upon the value of the properties which rendered the service.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is it not true that the only basis of valuation that can be established for a fixed rate of return is through the property investment account until the actual value is ascertained by the physical valuation of the railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not ready, Mr. President, to concede that. I think that in every instance in which it becomes necessary for the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain the value of a railroad it must take into account the history of the property investment account.

The Interstate Commerce Commission knows already, in a general way, how these investment accounts have been created or how they have been built up. They know that, and I think the Interstate Commerce Commission, in valuing a property, should take into account those elements of value which the law recognizes for rate-making purposes, because that is, after all, the only material thing that the Interstate Commerce Commission has to consider with reference to values. I could not agree that it should accept the investment account without careful review.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then the Senator thinks the Interstate Commerce Commission can readjust that account according to the provisions of the law under which it is governed?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no provision of the law with regard to investment accounts.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not that I know of.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I thought there was such a provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. Possibly some one will correct me if I am wrong about that; but, as I remember it, the investment account is purely a creature of a rule or order of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Up to 1907 the railroad companies kept their investment accounts just as they pleased, and they were grossly exaggerated in many instances. For instance, if a company entered into a contract to build a road, or a part of a road, it would issue to the contractor the stocks and bonds of the particular venture in compensation for the construction of the track or road; no matter whether the bonds and stocks were worth 20 cents on the dollar, or whether more than that was received for them, there would be charged up to the property investment account the par value of these stocks and bonds. It might be twice as much as actually went into the property or was put into the property by the contractor. In fact, the work that the Interstate Commerce Commission has already done in the valuation of the Kansas City Southern and one or two other roads in that vicinity has disclosed that it was in this way that the investment account, prior to 1907, was brought into existence.

In that year the Interstate Commerce Commission issued orders or rules for the keeping of the property investment account, and since that time I believe that the account fairly represents the money which has been expended in the improvements and the additions to these various properties.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I sympathize, in part at least, with the view expressed by the Senator that the condition of the poor roads should excite the commiseration and sympathy of Congress; but it seems to me, while not expressing any definite view, the vice of the bill which we are now considering, and the fallacy of the position of the Senator, the chairman of the committee, rest in this fact: Primarily Congress is not concerned in the success or failure of any enterprise. It is not the duty of Congress, if I make an improper investment in the construction of a ship which soon becomes obsolete and can not compete with the better class of ships, to establish rates by which my poor investment shall be converted into a profitable one. That is a paternalism which I think is not warranted.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. KING. This is not a question, and I apologize to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree perfectly with the statements which the Senator from Utah has just made. There is no parallel, however, between the instance he names and the railroad system of the United States. But I hope that he will not advance me to that particular subject until I reach it in the regular order.

Mr. KING. I apologize for anticipating, but I did want to state to the Senator that it does seem to me we ought not to be so much concerned as to whether some of these so-called poor roads live or not. They are going to live. They may have to be reorganized down to a value upon which they can render service that will make returns.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know, and I am going to discuss that phase of the railroad problem. I am looking at this, and the committee has looked at it, from the national standpoint. It has considered that every part of the country is interested in the transportation of every other part, and I myself would as soon think of charging half a cent for taking a letter from New York to Brooklyn and 15 cents for carrying a letter from New York to Salt Lake City as I would the abolition of our great national system of transportation. You must view it from that standpoint if you are to accomplish the general welfare.

[At this point Mr. CUMMINS ended his speech for the day.]

Wednesday, December 3, 1919.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, reviewing my observations made yesterday, I find that upon two or three matters I was not as complete as I intended to be, and I shall call attention to those matters this afternoon.

The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] propounded a very material question with regard to the security which the United States will have for the repayment to it of the sums advanced during the last two years for additions, betterments, and other purposes, and suggested that there ought to be a provision in the bill for a lien upon the railway property.

I did not have at hand, when the Senator asked the question, the Federal-control act which gave the President authority to make those advances. Inasmuch as I desire the RECORD to be as full and accurate as possible, I now take the liberty of presenting the legislation under which the indebtedness was created. It is found in section 6 of the Federal-control act and is as follows:

SEC. 6. That the sum of $500,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which, together with any funds available from any operating income of said carriers, may be used by the President as a revolving fund for the purpose of paying the expenses of the Federal control, and so far as necessary the amount of just compensation, and to provide terminals, motive power, cars, and other necessary equipment, such terminals, motive power, cars, and equipment to be used and accounted for as the President may direct and to be disposed of as Congress may hereafter by law provide.

The President may also make or order any carrier to make any additions, betterments, or road extensions, and to provide terminals, motive power, cars, and other equipment necessary or desirable for war purposes or in the public interest on or in connection with the property of any carrier. He may from said revolving fund advance to such carrier all or any part of the expense of such additions, betterments, or road extensions, and to provide terminals, motive power, cars, and other necessary equipment so ordered and constructed by such carrier or by the President, such advances to be charged against such carrier and to bear interest at such rate and be payable on such terms as may be determined by the President, to the end that the United States may be fully reimbursed for any sums so advanced.

Any loss claimed by any carrier by reason of any such additions, betterments, or road extensions so ordered and constructed may be determined by agreement between the President and such carrier; failing such agreement the amount of such loss shall be ascertained as provided in section 3 hereof.

It will be observed that there is no provision made in this section for a lien upon the property of the carrier.

It is under that authority that the United States has created the obligations which the carriers must now discharge.

I referred yesterday to the fact that the present bill provided only that the President for these advances, or such parts of them as were not to be instantly paid, should take the first-mortgage bonds of the carriers in so far as practicable; and if such bonds were not available, then such evidences of indebtedness as the President might determine. Whether the United States can now declare that these advances shall constitute a lien upon the property of the railroad companies is a matter of very grave doubt. I am inclined to think that it could not by this legislation impose upon the railroad companies involuntarily a lien for the sums which the carriers now owe the Government. Undoubtedly the Government could say to the railroad companies that these sums must be instantly paid, and in default of that payment it could proceed in the usual and ordinary way for the enforcement of an indebtedness. As, however, I attempted to point out on yesterday, it is utterly impossible for the carriers to pay the sums which have been advanced and which are properly chargeable to capital account. The return of the property or properties to the carriers with any condition of that kind would be a useless ceremony. It would result in the very rapid failure upon the part of the carriers to perform their duties to the public and would result in foreclosures everywhere.

I make this explanation because I think all the members of the committee are very anxious to take every precaution that can be properly taken to make certain the repayment to the Government. I have been so much impressed with the suggestion of the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that I hope during the progress of the consideration of the bill to submit that question again to the committee and to take its view upon the practicability of increasing the security that may be demanded from the railway companies.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. It might be suggested here that as the Government could not make this a lien ahead of the present liens upon the property the Government always has a remedy by bringing suit against the road and enforcing judgment by receivership, just the same remedy as it would have if it had a lien created by Congress, provided Congress could create such a lien.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I presume, however, that this is an unsecured indebtedness, and while upon default in its payment a judgment creditor could obtain the appointment of a receiver that would be a very inadequate remedy, and the one that the committee has proposed will be infinitely preferable, in my judgment, to that course.

I was asked yesterday also with regard to the number of employees in addition to those regularly employed while the properties were still in the hands of their owners and also with regard to the advance which had been made in compensation. I think the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] answered yesterday correctly with regard to the addition in the number of the employees, but inasmuch as it is quite an important item I desire to read from a report made by the Railroad Administration, which is dated November 14, 1919, but which did not come into the hands of the Senate until the 18th day of November:

The number of employees of all kinds upon the railways of the United States—

Class 1 railroads I am speaking of alone—in December, 1917, was 1,703,748. The number of employees on the same roads in July, 1919, was 1,894,287—

An increase in number of 190,539. It required in the month of July, 1919, 190,539 more men to operate the properties than were found necessary in December, 1917.

I suggested yesterday that the increase in the compensation of railway workers, while generally thought to have been very great and excessive, is in fact quite below the increase in compensation in other occupations of a similar character. I mentioned that the increase was a little above 40 per cent. Inasmuch, however, as that may be misunderstood, I desire again to quote from the report made by the Director General of Railroads upon this subject.

According to that report—and I accept it as accurate—the increase in the unit of compensation of all employees between December, 1917, and July, 1919, was 53 per cent.

Now mark the difference between the percentage of increase in the unit of compensation and the percentage of increase in the actual compensation for a month's labor. I repeat that, according to the report, the per cent of increase in the unit of compensation between these two periods was 53; but when we turn to the table which shows the average percentage of increase in monthly compensation, quite a different outcome is observed, for, compared in that way, this is the result: Percentage of increase to July, 1919, over December, 1917, 32.9; monthly average for the whole calendar year of 1917, the increase—bringing in again the compensation prevalent in July, 1919—was 42.7 per cent.

It was that percentage I had in mind when I made the statement which I did make yesterday; but, whether the one basis or the other be taken as the proper one to measure the practical increase in compensation, no one can assert that there has been added to the pay of the railway men an excessive sum when the cost of living is considered.

We all understand that the cost of living, the cost of commodities which must be bought with the compensation which the railway men receive, has increased somewhere from 80 to 100 per cent, and I for one have the utmost sympathy with the demand which is now being made by the railway men for an additional increase in their compensation, for the instances that people ordinarily relate when they are discussing this subject are the instances of inordinate increase, and there are a great many of these increases which have come about by a false classification but which do not as a whole affect the general body of the railroad operatives.

I regret that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is not present.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think, if the Senator will consult the only tables which I know to be complete—those published by the Bureau of Economics in Boston—he will find that the increase in the cost of living from 1915 to 1919 is about 73 per cent and the increase in wages is about the same.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true. I mentioned the increase in the cost of living, in a general way, as from 80 to 100 per cent. Some commodities have increased more than 100 per cent, some less than 80 per cent; but I have no doubt the average is substantially as stated by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Am I correct in the understanding I have that the percentage of increase quoted by the Senator in the pay of railway men was from July, 1917, to December——

Mr. CUMMINS. From December, 1917, to July, 1919.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that the Senator from Iowa does not go back to the period mentioned by the Senator from Minnesota, namely, 1915?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; that is correct.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There was some increase from 1915 to 1917.

Mr. KELLOGG. A very great increase.

Mr. CUMMINS. There had been an increase in wages before December, 1917. I think the increase occurred in 1917, probably.

Mr. KELLOGG. The increase in wages from 1915 to 1919 is seventy-two and a fraction per cent, and the increase in the cost of living is 73 per cent. The Senator stated correctly the increase of wages from December, 1917, until July, 1919, which was 42.7 per cent. During that time, however, the cost of living had not gone up quite that amount.

Mr. CUMMINS. The whole purpose of these suggestions is to show that the increases in wages that have been allowed by the Railroad Administration are not to be criticized. They are, I think, fairly within the general policy of all employers throughout the country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator explain what is the significance of the figures he gives which indicate that the increase in the unit of compensation has been greater than the increase in the monthly compensation?

Mr. CUMMINS. The significance of those figures lies in this, that the men are working fewer hours than they did. That is obvious, and accounts in part for the additional number of employees now necessary to operate the properties. The unit of compensation is the hour, generally speaking, and the increase in that unit has been 53 per cent; but the increase in the actual compensation received by the employee for his monthly work—in other words, the number of dollars that he earned during the month—has only been increased 42 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The increase in the cost of the labor to the Government, then, has been 53 per cent?

Mr. CUMMINS. The increase to the Government has been 53 per cent, but that does not represent that degree of increase in the purchasing power of the month's work on the part of the employee.

Mr. President, yesterday at the very close of the explanation I was attempting to make of the bill I was discussing the disparity in the earning power of the several railroads of the country. I had taken the property investment account kept by the railroad companies as a basis for the computation of that disparity. I had shown that upon that basis the degree of difference in earning power was so great that it is wholly impossible to give to each railroad company the right to earn a fair return upon its value, whatever that value may be, and maintain the weaker properties, because it is utterly impossible for the weaker properties to enjoy any higher rates than are given to the stronger railroads. In so far as they are competitive they must carry on their business upon uniform charges for transportation between competitive points.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] understood me in some way or other to affirm or suggest that the property investment account was a proper measure of the value of these several properties, and I do not wonder that he at once challenged that conclusion, understanding it as he did; but I feel that this afternoon, in the very first instance, I must make that perfectly clear. I used the property investment account solely as a basis for a discussion upon the disparity or difference in the earning power of the several railroads. I am just as much at war with the property investment accounts of the several railroads as criteria or standards of the value of those properties as the Senator from Nebraska can possibly be; but I had to take some basis for the computation, and my conclusions are just as certain if any other basis be taken. I care not what basis be taken for the ascertainment of the value of the properties, unless it be the basis of mere capitalization of the earnings from year to year, and I assume that no one would contend that that was or is a fair basis. However, it would answer my purpose just as well if I did take that so far as future investments are concerned.

This bill, however, does not attempt to deal with the value of railroad properties. It does not do it, first, because it is not a legislative question. It is no more possible, legally, constitutionally speaking, for the Congress of the United States to determine what the railroad property of the United States is worth than it would be to determine what a man's farm is worth which it desired to take for a public purpose. Not only so, but it is constitutionally unable even to declare what elements shall be considered by an assessing or a judicial board in reaching a conclusion as to the value of property. For these reasons the bill does not venture upon that domain. It commits that whole problem to the only jurisdiction which under our Constitution can consider it; but in showing to the Senate that our former system of regulation had entirely failed, that it was fatally defective, I attempted to apply the earnings of a score of railroads to the property investment account simply to demonstrate that these railroads could not survive unless our system is radically changed.

I turn now to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] as one who has studied this subject, and studied it deeply. I think I understand his general viewpoint. He is not in favor, I assume from some observations I have heard fall from him, of Government ownership and operation. He is very much opposed to that policy in transportation; and, if I correctly understood him yesterday, he seemed to think that a railroad which under a given body of rates could not earn enough to maintain itself should either be abandoned or its value should be reduced to a point which would enable its earnings to reward the capital which was represented in the value.

Mr. President, I want the Senator from Utah to reflect upon that proposition. I do not say that there is not a form in which the Government of the United States can in substance confiscate railway property, although I doubt whether under our Constitution that result can be accomplished even in the way inferentially suggested by the Senator from Utah, and I will tell him why.

According to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and according to the views of every other tribunal in all the world of which I have ever heard, they have this general idea with regard to the regulation of public utilities: That is to say, if a public utility is fairly constructed, if it is properly and efficiently managed, it has a right under the Constitution to earn a fair return upon the investment, upon the value of the property which renders the services—not upon the value of the property as determined by a capitalization of its earnings under a given body of rates—but it has a constitutional right to earn, as against regulation, a fair return upon the value of the property—that is, its investment—if it has been honestly constructed and is efficiently operated. The Supreme Court of the United States has declared that doctrine over and over again. It is idle for us to attempt, even if we were to desire to attempt, to escape the principle which the courts have laid down. It is a just principle; it is fair and honest; and I for one do not desire to escape it.

In such a case, in the case of a railroad that is earning, we will say, 1 per cent upon that fair investment under honest management, why is it not earning more than 1 per cent? It is not earning more than 1 per cent for two reasons: First, our regulating tribunals have determined the rates upon which it shall do business. We have interfered with its liberty in the transaction of its business to that extent; but if we have not interfered directly we have attached those rates to some competitor which can do business upon, we will assume, the body of rates which I have premised, and that renders the unfortunately situated property incapable of earning more. Now, I believe that any such system is not only unfair but it is unconstitutional as well.

The only escape from it, and that is one which no Senator ought to contemplate for a single moment in the case of a railroad, is to allow the fortunate railroad to charge so high a rate that the disadvantageously situated rival can earn a sufficient income to pay a fair return upon the investment which has been honestly made and upon a property which is efficiently operated; and that is where we will come finally if we do not adopt the policy which this bill proposes. We will come to the point where the Interstate Commerce Commission will be compelled to attach rates or approve rates for such great properties as the New York Central, the Pennsylvania, the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe, the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, the Chicago & North Western, and the Great Northern that will be high enough to enable the same rates to yield a moderate, fair return upon the investment in the properties which are not so advantageously and fortunately situated. We will be compelled to do it simply because we must maintain these systems of transportation. The great general public has a right to ask of its Government such a system of regulation as will give to each community the transportation upon which its life, its growth, its development depends.

That is my view of the justice of the matter; I do not mean the justice of the last suggestion I made, because I sincerely hope we will never be driven to the extremity of raising the rates upon the great railroads which do a profitable business so high as that their less fortunately circumstanced competitors can live. We will never be compelled to do that if we are fairly intelligent in our system of regulation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DIAL in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. In order to present, so far as a concrete illustration can, some of the things that are running through my mind, I would like to suggest to the Senator a matter that came under my observation a number of years ago.

The Rocky Mountain Bell Telephone Co. was serving a number of States, and serving them well. Some men without any very great amount of capital conceived the idea of invading that district and establishing another telephone system covering a portion of one State, if not extending into another State.

They had two things in view. First, that the Rocky Mountain Bell Telephone Co.'s rates were too high; second, that they would penetrate certain fields into which the first company had not entered, and that they would be able to earn sufficient to justify the investment. They constructed their system. Soon after it began to operate they discovered that with the rates that were prevailing it was absolutely impossible for them to compete with the other telephone company, and they asked the municipalities in which they had obtained franchises to permit them to increase the rates above existing rates. In one or two instances, as I recall, that was permitted; but in the end the corporation failed, and it was bid in, when it was sold at auction, as I recall, by its competitor.

I can not conceive of any theory of justice which would warrant the Government getting behind that company and advancing the rates of the Rocky Mountain Bell Telephone Co., which was satisfied with existing rates, to a higher level, in order to permit this other company to make a moderate income upon the investment.

I have a railroad corporation in mind that parallels the illustration which I have just given.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I have no doubt I have in mind the same railroad, or at least I think I could name it. I assume the Senator means the Western Pacific?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I fully concur in the conclusion just stated by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and this bill proceeds upon that principle. This bill gives to the Government the right to declare an abandonment of any particular railroad. If it has been built without necessity, and if it is carried on without a fairly good reason for its maintenance, it ought to be abandoned, it ought to be suspended as a railroad, and its property ought to be sold for whatever it is worth.

Mark you, I am speaking only of those roads which the good of the communities through which they run requires shall be sustained, and there are 75,000 miles, possibly 100,000 miles, of main-track railroad in the United States that can not be maintained upon the rates which will maintain the more than 160,000 miles which remain.

What will you do with our railroad system? Some of the views seem to be that every road which does not, under the existing situation, earn a revenue that will maintain it should be abandoned. If you were to do that, you would provoke a rebellion in the United States compared with which any unrest that we now observe would be but a zephyr as compared with a Kansas cyclone.

I undertake to say that it will never be attempted. I am sure that we will maintain the roads substantially as they are. Here and there there will be a road that ought to be abandoned, of course, and that will be abandoned under the policy of this bill. But in the main the 260,000 miles of railway which now serve the people of the United States will be maintained, and they can only be maintained, in my judgment, in private ownership and operation through the policy adopted in this bill.

I am willing to take up the instance of the Western Pacific. The Western Pacific road is one which was recently built, not very many years ago, from Salt Lake to San Francisco, and throughout a large part of its length or course it parallels the Union Pacific road. In my judgment it never ought to have been built, at least as it was built. It never ought to have been built as a competitor, in that sense. There may be communities upon this road which locally it serves well and serves efficiently. But as a competing line it never had an opportunity to live.

If I may be allowed the suggestion, which has no weight whatever, because my judgment will not prevail in the end in this matter, in my opinion a large part of the Western Pacific ought to be abandoned. There are probably 600 miles of it that could be used as a subordinate track with the Union Pacific to very good advantage. There are other miles of it that could be used for local purposes. But that is the very thing that we are attempting to do in this bill, to bring the whole railroad system of the United States under intelligent review and supervision, so that all the properties can be so related to each other that they will render the best possible service at the lowest possible cost.

I come now to my conclusion from all these interesting facts. It seems to me it must be obvious to any thinking man who has studied this subject that there is but one way to meet the problem which is created by the disparity in the earning power of our several railroads. I omitted, however, to complete my reply to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and I shall digress for a moment upon that. Even if it were possible constitutionally to reduce the value of these properties that do not earn, under existing rates, enough to maintain themselves, even if we could do that, and thus deal with investments already made, unjustly I think, but assuming we could do it, these properties can not maintain themselves on the investments already made.

As our country grows and its business develops it will be necessary for the weaker properties to grow as well, if they meet the demands of business; and if they do grow, some one must be willing to invest his money in these enterprises. Even if we could practically confiscate the properties as they now exist, we can not compel those who have money to invest it hereafter in the properties unless they are fairly assured, unless they believe, that in the operation of the properties they will from year to year receive fair interest upon their money. How would the Senator from Utah reach that situation? It can not be reached save through consolidation, and I am going to put that up to him with a good deal of emphasis now. It can be reached through Government ownership, and to that I invite your attention for a moment. I do not mean the merits of Government ownership, but I mean the method through which this problem, heretofore insoluble, must be reached. I repeat, if we ever solve it at all it must be solved through consolidation of the various railroad properties.

We are agreed that we can not raise the rates upon the weaker properties so that they will be self-sustaining, because that would give to the stronger properties, which move 70 per cent of the business of the United States, an income so excessive that it would not be tolerated for a single month. Therefore that solution must be discarded. We can not give to the stronger properties the rates which would return for them no more than a fair interest upon the value of their property and that alone, because that means death to the weaker properties which must compete with them in traffic, and, of course, upon the same terms, so far as rates are concerned. So we must inquire further. We must find some other way in which we can maintain the general transportation system of the United States and promote the welfare of our people. We must find some other way in which to do it. How can we accomplish it?

You may inquire as you will, you may study it as deeply as you may, but you will finally reach the conclusion that it can only be done through consolidation. There are various kinds of consolidation. The problem can be solved by Government ownership because that is complete consolidation. If the Government owned and operated all the railroads of the United States it would, I take it, establish charges for transportation which would pay the cost of maintenance and operation and the interest upon whatever indebtedness might be created in acquiring the properties. It would then be compelled either to raise the rates and charges or to appropriate from the Treasury, if our past history is to be accepted as a lamp for our guidance in the future, something like a billion dollars a year in order to construct such additions, betterments, and enlargements as the progress and growth of the country would demand.

That is one way in which this problem can be reached, and it is a perfectly logical way in which to reach it, because it then reduces the transportation of the United States to a common level, and the United States becomes responsible for furnishing facilities in every quarter of the country.

That is one of the advantages of Government ownership, and I do not seek to disparage or minimize that advantage. It is one of the advantages which I failed to mention yesterday as accompanying the two years of Government operation. We have had an inexhaustible Treasury upon which to draw, and private management and operation do not have a treasury of that sort upon which to call whenever expenditures are required.

Those of you who are in favor of Government ownership and operation and believe that transportation can be furnished in that way to the people of the United States, full and adequate, more cheaply than it can be furnished through the medium or instrumentality of private corporations, are perfectly logical. I understand you. You would accomplish your purpose, although I think at great and growing cost.

But Senators who shrink from Government ownership and operation and still insist that we should seek no remedy, no solution of the problem which I have pointed out, and which under our old system is absolutely insoluble, are as illogical as human minds can be. You acknowledge a situation and yet are willing to take no step, adopt no measure to remove its injustice and its inadequacy.

When I say "you," I do not know that there is a man of that kind in the Senate, but I know that there are some outside. I am not going to believe that there is a man in the Senate who will not stand either for Government ownership and operation or for such consolidation of the railroad properties of the United States as will remove the evils, the difficulties, the obstacles which I have pointed out.

As I remarked some time ago, I am not in favor of Government ownership and operation at this time. I look forward, though, with very little optimism so far as private ownership and private operation are concerned. I am going to do my best throughout the discussion of the bill to make private ownership and private operation possible. But if these railway properties can not be restored to their owners under such conditions and with such regulation as in my judgment will make private ownership and operation successful, then I am instantly and from that time forward for Government ownership and operation.

To me it is cowardice of the most striking character for Congress to return these properties to their owners, knowing that they can not successfully operate them. I for one do not shrink from the alternative, and I repeat that if the properties can not be returned to private ownership under such conditions as will make private ownership possible and successful operation possible, then we ought to go, and so far as I am concerned all my influence and power will go, toward Government ownership and operation as the only course which can be pursued with any hope of giving to the people of the country the transportation facilities which they have a right to ask their Government to furnish.

Passing the question of Government ownership and operation, I come to the plan for consolidation, for I am planting myself firmly and immovably upon the principle, if it may be called a principle, of consolidation, for the reasons that I have already stated.

There are two kinds of consolidation which may be pursued in private ownership with continued private operation. The first is complete consolidation of all the railway properties of the United States in one corporation. That is the plan which will be found, if the Senators care to study it, in the bill introduced by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. It has some advantages. There are unquestionably some advantages in complete unification, complete control over all the railroads of the United States as a single transportation facility. I need not point them out. Everyone can recognize that there are some advantages.

The plan adopted by the committee, however, is consolidation into comparatively few systems. The bill provides that they shall be consolidated in not less than 20 nor more than 35 systems. I think it ought to be not less than 16 nor more than 30 or 35 systems, but that probably does not affect the merit of the proposal itself.

It will be for the Senate and the country to determine whether a consolidation into comparatively few systems or a complete consolidation will best serve the welfare of the people of the country. That is the question that you will have to determine before the bill is disposed of.

I am in favor of comparatively few systems for several reasons, and for these reasons I am in favor of it because it will permit the play of competition in service, and although you will regard me as exceedingly heterodox and possibly as unobservant of the history of the past, I say competition in rates also. This suggestion which has gone abroad over the country and which everybody has received and apparently accepted, that there is no competition in rates under the regulation which we have provided, is not well founded.

I am in favor of several systems so related to each other that they can carry traffic for substantially the same cost as compared with the value of their property, because it does permit, it invites, it commands that honorable rivalry in business which in my judgment is the mainspring of success in every enterprise. I am looking toward these advances of socialism, about which we have been talking this morning, with extreme regret, mainly because I believe that that theory of government destroys the initiative, the energy, the progress of mankind. I want to preserve in the railway service all of those moving forces which can possible be retained.

I mentioned a moment ago that there is a competition in rates. I know very well that if this bill is passed the Interstate Commerce Commission can easily exclude all competition in rates, because it is given the power in the bill, if it does not possess it already, to fix minimum as well as maximum rates; but as it is now, and as I think it ought to be, there should be no minimum rates unless established and commanded by the public authority. The railway companies have the right to initiate their rates. The railway companies are the agencies which in the first instance determine what the rates shall be—I am speaking now under the interstate commerce act—and the Interstate Commerce Commission exercises over that initiative supervisory power or jurisdiction. But if the railroad company wants to move freight from New York to Chicago at a lower rate than then prevails, it has a perfect right to file its schedule with the Interstate Commerce Commission proposing a reduction of that rate. It is true that the Interstate Commerce Commission may forbid, but if it does not forbid, the rate goes into effect at the end of the time appointed by the statute. Therefore, between competitive roads or roads doing a competitive business under our present system there is always the opportunity for a limited competition, a limited rivalry, not only in service but in rates.

I do not attach, however, so great importance to the competition or rivalry so far as rates are concerned as I do to the rivalry in service. You all have your own opinions with regard to that matter, and I could not say anything, I am sure, that would either enlighten you or change your judgments upon it; but I appeal to the observation and experience of every Senator with regard to the value of rivalry and competition in service. It begins with a desire to please the people who either ride upon trains or whose property is transported from one place to another. It means attention, it means courtesy, it means a concern for the public mind that could not be secured in any other way than through the opportunity of the public to pass from one service to another. It means infinitely more when we come to consider the ease with which one patron is served and the ease with which the desires of another may be denied; the furnishing of cars promptly, the movement of cars speedily, the effort made in every quarter, through every employee, to do the work at hand in the most efficient manner in which it is capable of being done.

This is the reason the committee has decided that it would be better to consolidate the railroads of the United States into not less than 20 nor more than 35 systems, in order to accomplish, first, the possibility of imposing a given body of rates upon the carriers with the outcome that each of the systems would earn substantially the same net return as compared with the value of the property employed in the service; and, second, in order to give this great business, this overpowering business, the same motive for efficiency and excellence that we observe, and hope we always will observe, in every other great venture.

I beg your attention for a moment to the practicability of a division of the railway properties into not less than 20 nor more than 35 systems that will accomplish the purposes I have described. The committee has not acted without the utmost consideration on that question and without all the information that it could secure. The committee—and I speak more confidently of my own convictions—knows that it is practicable to divide the railways of the United States into not less than 20 nor more than 35 systems, so that tested by the business of the three years before the war—and that is the period to which we must all resort in order to obtain information upon that subject—the net earnings of each system compared with the value of the property rendering the service, I care not how the value of the property is ascertained, will be so nearly equal that the difference will be negligible. I venture the prophesy that if the provisions of this bill shall ever go into effect the governmental body which is appointed to make the division and to carry out the provisions of the bill will be able to divide the country into 20 systems, and there will not be the difference of one-quarter of 1 per cent in the earnings, the net income, of the several systems as compared with the value of the properties as fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Then, if we pursue the policy of private ownership, we will have a body of railroads upon which the Interstate Commerce Commission can act, doing justice both to the people and to those who have invested their money in the properties. Then the Interstate Commerce Commission can make rates that will pay to the carriers, as nearly as human foresight can provide, just enough to make a fair return upon the value of the property.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wonder if the Senator meant that the earnings in each system would be substantially the same?

Mr. CUMMINS. What I mean—possibly I can state it concretely, so that it will not be capable of being misunderstood—is this: Suppose the value of property of one system is $100,000,000 and the value of the property of another system is $50,000,000. What I mean to say is that those two systems, if they should constitute two of the systems into which the railroads are divided, will each earn, say, 5 per cent upon the value of the property, or 4 per cent, or whatever rate is determined to be a just and reasonable rate for the compensation of capital.

Mr. President, I have pointed out at very great length the views of the committee—and they are my own views as well—upon this fundamental proposal, because it is the heart of the bill. If it is not thought desirable to make this advance toward the regulation of these public utilities, my judgment would be that it is not advisable to pass the bill at all, for if the roads are to be returned under the regulation which formerly existed, believing, as I do, that private operation under such conditions is impossible and that it will end in utter collapse, I will necessarily find myself advocating the assumption upon the part of the Government of the duty of owning and operating our transportation facilities.

Having, as I hope, laid the subject before you with such fullness as will enable you, at any rate, to understand what the committee has so earnestly proposed, I now pass to the plan under which the result is to be accomplished. I do not intend to go very much into detail with regard to the plan, because undoubtedly at some future time it will be necessary to discuss it with more particularity than is possible at this time; but the plan, as outlined in sections 9 and 10 of the bill, is this: The bill proposes to create a transportation board. Originally we called it a "railway transportation board," but then, in view of the suggestion coming from some quarters that this name seemed to disregard transportation by water, a subject which needs the encouragement of all who are interested in transportation, the committee changed the name of the board, so that as the bill now is before you it is simply the "transportation board." I shall have occasion to comment upon the organization of the board and some of its more important functions a little later; but immediately upon the passage of the bill, and after the transportation board is organized—and I may say here that it is to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, in harmony with the creation of all such bodies—the transportation board is to undertake to divide all the railways of the United States, with some immaterial exceptions which I need not now mention, into not less than 20 nor more than 35 systems. The discretion between 20 and 35 is vested in the board; and, in order that you may know just how the committee felt with regard to the board and with regard to this division, I intend to read very briefly from section 9, as follows:

SEC. 9. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States, in the exercise of its authority to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and its other constitutional powers, that the railways of the continental United States shall, as soon as may be practicable, and in the manner hereinafter provided, be divided in ownership and for operation into not less than 20 nor more than 35 separate and distinct systems, each of said systems to be owned and operated by a distinct corporation organized or reorganized under this act.

In the aforesaid division of the said railways into such systems competition shall be preserved as fully as possible, and wherever practicable the existing routes and channels of trade and commerce shall be maintained. The several systems shall be so arranged that the cost of transportation as between competitive systems and as related to the value of the properties through which the service is rendered shall be the same so far as practicable, so that these systems can employ uniform rates in the movement of competitive traffic and under efficient management earn substantially the same rate of return upon the value of the railway properties involved in the comparison.

This might be called the charter of the new system. It is further developed in section 10 by providing that the transportation board shall make this division and then give public notice to all who are interested of a hearing upon it, and at that hearing all who may be interested either from the capital standpoint or the labor standpoint or the shipping standpoint will be heard, and after that hearing is concluded then the board adopts a plan, whatever plan may seem to it wise, and if that plan of division is approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission it becomes final, save as it may be modified upon subsequent application by anyone who may present a good cause for reconsideration in that respect.

We now have the 260,000 miles of railway divided into these systems so far as the map of the country is concerned, and we know just how, for the future, these roads must be consolidated, just how they must be associated with each other, and then begins the work of consolidation.

For a period of seven years the consolidations are voluntary. I think the period is too long. I have to be perfectly frank about it. I did everything I could in the committee to make the period a shorter one; but I intend to stand by the judgment of the committee in that respect, because I regard it as rather an incident than as involving a principle. For seven years these consolidations can go on upon the initiation of the railways. If any railway company desires to organize a Federal corporation under the provisions of this bill, a new corporation can be organized. If, on the other hand, a corporation already organized desires to reorganize so as to become a Federal corporation, it may do so under the terms of this bill; but the consolidation that takes place during the seven years must be either through the medium of a corporation organized under the terms of the bill or through a corporation reorganized under the terms of the bill. We have made practically the same provision for reincorporating State corporations that was made long ago for the reincorporation of national banks, turning a national bank from a State institution into a Federal institution. One or the other of these two things must precede any consolidation which takes place under the bill.

These things being done, one or the other of them, then the consolidation proceeds, and the consolidation must be in harmony with and in furtherance of the plan to which I have already referred, adopted by the transportation board and approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission; so that every step taken in voluntary consolidation is a step which finally will be in harmony with the enforced consolidation which proceeds after the seven years have elapsed.

I may say a word with regard to the seven years. The only reason for postponing compulsory consolidation for a single moment, in my judgment, is that the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission in valuing the railroad properties may be completed. It is said that this work will have been finished in the course of two or three years.

It may, however, be five years before it is finally and fully done; and inasmuch as these incorporations, whether reorganizing or originally incorporating, must be based upon the actual value of the railroad properties, it was quite essential that some time be given to the Interstate Commerce Commission to complete its work. In the case of a voluntary consolidation, it would be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission at once to go forward to the ascertainment of the value of the property immediately concerned in the voluntary consolidation, and to complete that particular part of the work at the earliest possible moment. And this leads me, now, to suggest an additional reason for the value which I attach to the consolidation.

All of us know that there has been a great deal of controversy, very much suspicion, infinite distrust among the people with respect to the value of railroad property as compared with the capitalization. I said a few moments ago that constitutionally we are unable to determine the value of railroad property, or even to indicate or declare the elements which a judicial tribunal shall consider in determining that value. Nevertheless, it is of the highest importance that in some way or other the feeling on the part of the people that they are called upon to contribute a revenue which is to be distributed upon unfounded capital shall be removed. It can only be removed in one of two ways. It must either be removed by ascertaining that the present capitalization is not greater than it should be—a contingency which does not meet my view of it—or it may be removed by reducing the capitalization to the real value of the property upon which the people are called upon to pay a return. This bill provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall ascertain the value of this property as the consolidations take place, and that the capitalization of these new corporations which are brought into existence in the manner I have described shall not exceed the value of the railroad property; and once this principle is adopted and once these consolidations shall have taken place, the terror which we all have in mind, known as the unearned increment, can no longer disturb the American people.

I want as much as anyone can want that the people shall be called upon to pay only upon an actual value; and while I know that we can not determine for the past years what value is and what elements it shall contain, for the future we can; and if these consolidations are carried into effect the future is safe, so far as unearned increment is concerned and so far as values are concerned. We will have that matter settled for all time. I do not want you to think that I have no view with regard to the elements which should be taken into consideration in determining the value of railroad property, for I have a very firm conviction upon that subject, the result of many years of study; but it is useless for me to discuss that, because it is not a matter for congressional determination. If the Senate could determine what things should be taken into consideration in determining the value of railroad property, I would be urging upon you the standard which I think ought to be accepted; but I know that neither the Senate nor Congress is able to influence that subject, and so this bill remits it first to the tribunals created for the regulation of the property and next to the courts of the land, where it must ultimately find its final determination.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I do not quite understand how the Senator is so sure that the unearned increment shall not be included in estimating the value.

Mr. CUMMINS. Simply because these reorganized or originally incorporated companies are permitted a return upon nothing more than their actual investment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator mean by "investment" the original cost?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes, sir; I mean the amount invested.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is, then, the basis that is being used for the present method of establishing the value of the railroads?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not say that. That is just the difference. We can not say what shall be the basis for valuing these properties for the time that is past, for people who have invested their money. That is a judicial question; but if we allow a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States, and it is organized and it agrees with the United States that its investment shall be the measure of the value of its property, it can not complain.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But I understand that if it is not willing to agree, the provisions of the bill proposed by the Senator make it compulsory.

Mr. CUMMINS. It will be compulsory after the period of seven years. We can not compel them to agree, but we take the property then. We take the property, and secure the incorporation of a corporation just exactly as we did with the Shipping Board.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In that case, how do you as a legislative proceeding exclude the unearned increment?

Mr. CUMMINS. Because in the articles of incorporation which that company must adopt if it is to acquire a system of railway, it agrees with the Government that that shall be done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can see how that would be all right as long as it is voluntary on the part of the corporations; but how can we compel them to do it?

Mr. CUMMINS. You can not compel the incorporation, and if the Government can not find men who are willing to enter into one of these incorporations and organize it and become the owners of one of the systems of railway, then the plan must fail. We can not coerce men into these investments; but we believe that there will be no difficulty, with the influence of the Government, in securing the organization of these companies to take over this property just exactly as we have done heretofore.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator how you get title to the property of the companies that do not want to join?

Mr. CUMMINS. Through the exercise of the power of eminent domain.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator thinks that they could be taken by this corporation that is to be organized under the power of eminent domain?

Mr. CUMMINS. Surely. The United States can take them directly, through the exercise of the power upon its part, and transfer them to a corporation organized as I have suggested, or it can give the corporation which is to be organized the authority to take the properties for the purpose mentioned.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In a case of that sort, where they are taken under the power of eminent domain, what is the measure of the price that must be paid?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I wish I could answer that question, but I can not. That is a judicial question, and there is as much difference of opinion with regard to the elements which should be considered in making up a value as there is upon any other of the numerous constitutional provisions that we have constantly under our consideration here.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I asked those questions because the Senator seemed so sure that he could exclude the unearned increment as one of the elements.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am speaking of the future. We can not exclude the unearned increment for the past. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that. It has adopted a rule which does not meet my approval, and does not seem logical; but it has adopted a rule, and that rule does include unearned increment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I dislike to interrupt the Senator at all, because I am very much interested in the continuity of his argument; but it occurred to me during his discussion that the scheme outlined by the Senator would prohibit the building of intrastate railroads under State authority unless they were to be comprised, sooner or later, in one of these systems. Assuming that that is correct, does the Senator think we have power to do that?

Mr. CUMMINS. This particular part of the bill does not prohibit the building of any railroad.

Mr. THOMAS. That is my reading of it.

Mr. CUMMINS. But I want to be frank about it. There is another provision of the bill, and that, of course, is in the House bill, as well as this one, which does not permit the building of any railroad that is to do an interstate business without the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. THOMAS. I am speaking of intrastate business.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no road that I know of that does an intrastate business alone.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, I presume that is true; and yet there can be such a thing as the building of such a railroad. In fact, there are, I think, some electric lines within the States.

Mr. CUMMINS. They would not be included.

Mr. THOMAS. They would not be included; but would the bill prevent further construction along the line of that character of railroad?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no; in the first place, they would not be prohibited by the general principle of the bill; and, in the second place, they are expressly excluded.

Mr. THOMAS. I notice in the bill that these consolidations are to take place and other lines hereafter constructed, regardless of any prohibition or condition in State laws. But there is no reference to State constitutions in the bill, if I remember correctly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not remember that; but if there is no such provision in regard to constitutions, there ought to be.

Mr. THOMAS. I read the bill again last night, and the question occurred to me whether the bill sought to override the constitutional provisions of the States or whether they would be respected. In my State, for example, the constitution forbids the construction of parallel lines of railway. Under the provisions of this bill there is no express limitation of that sort. If under its operation there should be a consolidation of parallel lines in the State of Colorado, there would be a palpable violation of their State constitution, and I was curious, as a legal proposition, as to the possible effect of the bill upon such a condition, and then as to whether we would have the power to override such a limitation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator from Colorado called that to my attention, because, turning to it, I find that he is correct, that it mentions the laws of the States but does not mention the constitutions. But it is the intent of the committee to allow this consolidation to go forward as against the constitution of a State just as it would allow it to go forward against the statute of a State. Of course, it would be just as impossible to have Government ownership under the constitution of Colorado as it would be to have this consolidation, because that would be the consolidation of parallel lines, and I take it that under the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States, so far as a carrier or an instrumentality which does an interstate business is concerned, the Government can attach any provision or condition that it desires; whatever is necessary for the regulation of commerce among the States it can do.

Mr. THOMAS. Then in practical effect, when the bill, in its operation, comes in conflict with a State constitution, so much the worse for the State constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is a principle that I think we will all have to face. I regret that there is the conflict between State regulation and interstate regulation which exists, but it is impossible to avoid it; and if we are to treat transportation from the national standpoint, it is necessary, imperative, that we disregard some of the provisions of both State laws and State constitutions.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is entirely right, but the question which troubles me is our right to do that. Of course, if it exists at all, it must be under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Mr. CUMMINS. Under the commerce clause.

Mr. KING. Or the post-roads clause.

Mr. CUMMINS. If that is challenged at any time during the progress of this discussion, I think there are a good many authorities that can be cited to establish the constitutionality of the bill which we have proposed, just as I would contend that the Government has a perfect right to acquire the property and operate it under the power to regulate commerce, even disregarding our war powers or post-roads powers. I have no doubt about the power of the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not prepared at this time to challenge the Senator's contention at all. In fact, I should hesitate to do it under any circumstances, because he has practically made a life study of this proposition and I have not. But it suggests itself to my mind as a very interesting proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. I feel very much obliged to the Senator from Colorado for calling to my attention a palpable omission in the bill, because it is the intention of the committee to carry forward this process of consolidation as a power under the Constitution of the United States and without regard to either a State law or a State constitution, always with the limitation that if a State road desires to do business of a purely State character, then we have no jurisdiction over it at all, either to regulate its rates or to compel its consolidation.

Mr. President, I go forward a little further. After the period of seven years, the time of compulsory consolidation, begins, then whatever consolidation has not taken place during this period is in the hands of the transportation board, and is to go forward just as rapidly as practicable, recalling to your attention my former observation, that the voluntary consolidations are in harmony with and in furtherance of the original plan made by the transportation board, and which is now to be carried out after the seven years have elapsed.

I do not think that it would serve any good purpose to go into the detail of this arrangement. I hope that Senators will read the bill in that respect, and if it is found at any point immature or unworkable I hope that the attention of the committee will be called to it. It is sufficient to say that ultimately the theory of the bill is to have 15, 20, 25, or 30 systems of railroads competitive in their character and controlling and embracing all the railroads in the United States.

It is, of course, manifest that this consolidation can not take place, even measurably, for many years. It will be probably 10 or 12 years before the process is entirely complete, and if the railroads are to be returned within the near future it is necessary to provide what might be called a policy for the transition period, and it is to that I now call the attention of the Senate.

This policy is outlined or provided for in section 6 of the bill, and I have no doubt that as we go forward in the discussion of this measure section 6 will be the subject of more dispute, more real differences of opinion, than any other part of the bill. While I am discussing it, I want to be borne in mind what I have already mentioned, that if we return these properties to their owners we must make the provisions that are necessary, not alone to protect the investment already made in the property. We have great latitude with regard to the manner in which we shall deal with these investments. I hope we will always deal justly with them, even though investors are absolutely in our power. But when we return the properties to the owners, we must look forward to a successful operation on the part of the owners, and knowing that one of the elements of successful operation is the establishment of a credit on the part of the railway companies that will enable them to borrow the money which they must have in order to keep pace with the demands of business it becomes essential that we shall give some attention to the transition period in the way of rates.

I do not intend to read section 6, because it is so indelibly stamped upon my mind that I think I can recall all its features, and I shall be glad to have anyone who thinks I have omitted any vital part of it to remind me of it.

Section 6 provides that the territory and the railroads of the United States shall be divided by the Interstate Commerce Commission into rate-making districts. The commission can make as many or as few as, in its judgment, will serve the purposes in mind. However, it may be proper to say that the committee had in mind this phase of the question:

There is great difference in various parts of the country with respect to the increase or decrease in rates that may be found necessary in order to make certain returns. The eastern district, for instance, will require a good deal higher rate or a greater increase in rate to accomplish a certain purpose. I am not saying now whether there ought to be any increase or not, so far as any particular district is concerned. The eastern district is very differently situated from the western district or the southern district. I say that in passing in order to indicate why the commission is given authority to divide the country into rate-making districts.

Having done that, and having ascertained the value of the railroad properties as nearly as it can—I do not know how it can ascertain with absolute accuracy the value of the railway property just now, and I agree that it will be necessarily in the immediate future an estimate rather than a judicial ascertainment. Mark you, I am speaking of railway property; I am not speaking of investments in other kinds of property; I am speaking only of the property which renders the service of transportation, for that is all. We have not legislated concerning any other property; and these corporations which are to be organized under the plan of consolidation are not permitted to own any property except that which is essential or necessary to the rendition of the service.

Having ascertained the value of the property in a given district, the commission is directed to make rates or to approve rates that will as nearly as may be return an aggregate net operating income for all the railroads of that district equal to 5½ per cent on the value of the property in that district. The committee believes that 5½ per cent fairly represents the policy of Congress with respect to a return upon railway property. Originally, as I introduced the bill from the subcommittee, instead of a 5½ per cent rate, the provision was for a fair return upon the value of the property, but it was believed by the majority of the committee that it would be better for Congress to declare the policy rather than to transfer it or commit it to any regulating body. So for the first time in the history of railway regulation it is suggested that Congress shall declare what it regards as a fair return upon the value of property rendering a public service, and that fair return, according to the provisions of the bill, is 5½ per cent upon the value of the property involved.

The bill also gives to the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to increase that basis by one-half of 1 per cent, if it so desires to do, solely for the purpose of creating a fund for expenditures for what are known as nonproductive improvements and which are not under any circumstances to be capitalized, but which, in substance, will be held by the railway companies in trust for the public. I will not deal further with that phase of it, because I do not think it is material. I deal now only with the basis of 5½ per cent.

Now, remember, that this 5½ per cent does not relate to capitalization; it does not relate to capital stock; it does not relate to outside investments vast in their extent which some of the companies own and hold for profit. It relates only to the property which renders service to the public, and it is for you to say whether you believe that 5½ per cent upon the value of that property is more than a fair return.

I am going to be again absolutely frank about it. I am sure the remaining members of the committee will not complain if I say that 5½ per cent is more than I thought it ought to be. It seemed to me that a lower basis than that would furnish the credit which I grant you the railway companies must have if private operation is to be successfully continued. But the majority of the committee were of the opinion that 5½ per cent is a fair basis, and to that I finally agreed.

I was so much concerned in the composition of a bill which would receive the approval of the Congress and the country, so much concerned in securing a bill which would make certain adequate facilities for the commerce of the country, that I accepted that basis and I intend to stand for it during the consideration of the bill. I mention that only to show you that it is easy for me to understand differences of opinion with regard to that particular matter.

Again, frankness compels me to say that 5½ per cent upon the value of the property rendering the service does not mean that companies are limited in their dividend-paying capacity to 5½ per cent. There are $11,000,000,000 and more of bonds outstanding imposed as liens upon the railroad property. The average rate of interest upon these bonds is about 4½ per cent, and the company which earns 5½ per cent upon the value of its property, assuming that all this value is in railroad property, will be able to pay more than 5½ per cent dividends upon its capital stock, because the capital stock outstanding in the hands of the public of all the railroads is something like $6,000,000,000; that is only two-fifths of the capitalization, so that any railroad company can take what it saves between 5½ per cent and 4½ per cent upon three-fifths of its capitalization and increase its dividends, if it earns the money necessary to do it.

I think that I ought to state that in frankness to the subject, because I have no opinion upon the matter that I am not willing to disclose and I have no facts that I desire to conceal.

The basis of 5½ per cent increases the average operating income of the three years preceding the war—I mean the test period of three years prior to July 1, 1917—three-tenths of 1 per cent. The average rate of return upon the property investment accounts of all the railroads in the United States for the test period was 5.2 per cent, and if it were assumed that the value of the property is the amount of the property investment accounts, this increases that average by three-tenths of 1 per cent. My own judgment is, however, that it will be found that the value of the properties is less than the aggregate investment accounts and therefore the 5½ per cent will probably not be greater than during the test period.

Those of you who heard me discuss the Federal-control bill heard me say that I thought the compensation which that bill provided for was something like $200,000,000 more than it ought to be. I am of the same opinion still. I have seen nothing to disturb my judgment in that regard, and inasmuch as it has been suggested to me that there is something inconsistent in my advocacy of a 5½ per cent basis and my statement that the compensation provided for in the Federal-control bill was $200,000,000 more than it should be, I beg the privilege of pointing out the difference between the two cases.

In the Federal-control bill we were providing for an income for each individual railway, and I felt then and I feel now that the amounts which we agreed to pay to a great many of the railroads which passed under Federal control were excessive; but now we are dealing not with a particular railway, but with an entire system of railways in an entire rate-making district, and there is here no provision to pay or allow to these stronger railroad companies the excessive income which was permitted under the Federal-control act.

Moreover, the war has wrecked the world in a way. Conditions are abnormal, uncertain, and I look without any optimism at best upon the return of these properties to their owners, for in view of a movement that is sweeping over the world with regard to property, its ownership, its use, and its profit, I have the gravest doubt whether those who have money will be willing to invest it in railway securities, no matter what rate of return we may provide.

Money at this time is not worth, in things that money buys, more than one-half its former value, and I believe it is perfectly just that he who has a stated income—I mean the man who has a salary, the man who receives wages, the man who receives dividends for his support—I think it is just that his income, measured in dollars, should be increased. We have been discussing that subject from the time the war broke upon us until now, and, so far as I am concerned, I am quite willing to defend a larger rate of return upon an investment than I would have been willing to defend three years ago, for I know that the person to whom the return is made will, in the things which he is compelled to purchase with his return, be less well provided for than he was three or four years ago. In saying that I am not advocating any reduction in our excess-profits tax or any reduction in our income tax.

I should like to see every man pay the burdens of the Government according to his capacity to pay; but it must be remembered that a very large part of the stock of the railway companies is held by people of limited means. I know they have no control over the railroads; they do not attempt to exercise control; a few shares of stock control the destinies of a railroad simply by concentration in one hand. But, nevertheless, I believe that Congress would do less than justice if it did not approve a policy which would return a larger rate of interest upon investments of this kind than would have been defensible three, four, or five years ago.

Now, let us see what 5½ per cent will do. Five and a half per cent upon the value of the property in a given rate-making district does not mean that each railroad shall have 5½ per cent upon the value of its property. It means that one railroad will earn 8 per cent upon the value of its property, another railroad will earn 3 per cent or 5 per cent, some of them 2 per cent, some of them possibly as high as 10 per cent. That arises from the disparity in the earning capacity of the roads, which I have attempted to point out during the whole of my argument. When you put a given body of rates upon the territory lying between Chicago and New York, we will say, rates which must be used in common by the New York Central, the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore & Ohio, the Erie, the Chesapeake & Ohio, and so on, one of those roads will earn very much more than 5½ per cent while another will earn very much less than 5½ per cent. That is the insoluble problem under present conditions which I have been dwelling upon at such great length. We can not escape it in a moment; nothing can remove it except the consolidation of which I have spoken. However, until that consolidation takes place we must deal with it as best we can. That brings me to another feature of the section to which I have been alluding and which I intend to discuss just as briefly as possible.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator from Iowa leaves that question, the Senator was discussing the proposition of allowing under this plan of consolidation a return of 5½ per cent.

Mr. CUMMINS. No. The consolidation is an entirely different matter. The Senator from Utah is quite right that under the provisions for dividing the country into rate-making districts for immediate operation the rate would be 5½ per cent upon the value of the property in any given rate-making district.

Mr. KING. That is what I had reference to. The Senator from Iowa stated that it would be five years or possibly longer——

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it will be 10 years.

Mr. KING. Let me complete my sentence—before the commission appointed under the act of 1913 for the purpose of valuing the railroad properties is ready to report.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not say quite that. I said that one of the reasons why we postponed the time for compulsory consolidation was to enable the commission to make that report. The commission say—and I have no reason to doubt it—that they will be able to make a complete report upon the subject within two or three years.

Mr. KING. Assuming that the time will be three years, how does the Senator from Iowa propose to reach the valuation in order to determine the application of the rate of 5½ per cent until that report has been submitted?

Mr. CUMMINS. It will be done by the Interstate Commerce Commission. They will make the best estimate which they can of the value of the roads.

Remember, now, the Interstate Commerce Commission has already completed an inventory of all the railway property in the United States; it has had extensive hearings with regard to the principles which ought to be applied in determining values; it has all the reports of the railway companies showing their earning capacities; it knows better than any other tribunal can the condition of the physical property of the roads. With all this information in its hands, it must reach a conclusion upon the subject as well as it can. I remarked that I did not think it would be more than a fair estimate upon the value of the property.

Returning now to the feature which I was just mentioning when interrupted by the Senator from Utah, this bill proposes that any railway company which receives an operating income during any year of more than 6 per cent upon the value of its property shall divide equally the excess between 6 and 7 per cent between a company reserve fund and a general railroad contingent fund. The first portion belongs to the company itself, the latter belongs to the Government of the United States. The first is to be used by the company whenever its operating income falls below 6 per cent. It is to be accumulated from year to year until it reaches 5 per cent upon the value of the property. The excess above 7 per cent goes one-fourth to the company reserve fund and three-fourths to the Government. After that time the company retains one-third of the excess above 6 per cent and pays to the transportation board or to the Government two-thirds of the excess. The Government contingent fund has no limit and is to be used by the transportation board to advance the general transportation interests of the United States. However, it is not given so free a hand as my remarks migh indicate, for it is provided in the bill that the promotion of the general transportation interests must be effected either by the purchase of equipment and of transportation facilities to be rented or leased to the weaker railroad companies, or it must be used by loaning to the weaker companies sums of money to be expended in the purchase of facilities to render the service which the people require. That is the best that the committee could do in this transition period to equalize the spread in the earnings of the companies.

We were constantly impressed with the idea that we must accomplish in some way the maintenance of the weaker companies. We know that, judged by the ordinary standards of credit, when they go into the markets of the country they will be unable to borrow the money necessary to keep their properties in that condition necessary for economical and efficient use. So we propose to take from the larger railroad companies a portion of their excess earnings above 6 per cent and devote them to increasing the facilities in the hands of the companies which are unable to purchase or construct them for themselves.

I regard it as one not only of the most vital but most equitable features of the bill, as much and bitterly as it has been attacked.

I will say one word with regard to the attacks upon that feature of the bill. Singularly enough, it is assailed from two quarters. The railway executives, representing the railroads, attack it bitterly on the ground that it is not only unjust but unconstitutional, and some very enthusiastic citizens of the country who have no interest in railways attack it on the ground that it is an approach toward socialism or communism and ought not, therefore, to be fostered, encouraged, or adopted.

A moment's consideration may not remove your doubt with regard to its constitutionality, for I can not hope to remove a doubt in a moment that has been instilled by so distinguished an authority as an ex-Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; but I at least can point out the path along which the committee traveled in reaching the conclusion that the provision was and is constitutional.

Ex-Justice Hughes has rendered an opinion in which he says that that part of the bill is unconstitutional because it takes property from its owner without just compensation. Ex-Senator Elihu Root, occupying an equally commanding position at the bar of the country, is just as confident that it is constitutional. The lawyers have ranged themselves, a great many of them, upon one side or the other of this question; but I am bound to say that so far as they have been organized up to this time, a decided preponderance in number, at least, will be found upon the side of the committee, which holds that the provision is constitutional. To me there is no question about it. I do not want to disparage the learning of any man, certainly not his intelligence, but to me the proposition that this provision is unconstitutional means the destruction of all regulation. If it is true that we can not limit the earnings of a public utility, a common carrier, we might as well abandon our efforts to protect the people in any system of regulation.

I beg those who are here just to follow me for a moment, and they will perceive at once the theory upon which we who believe the bill is constitutional proceed.

Suppose there were but a single railroad in the United States, just one. Would anyone question that Congress could say that the rates for that railroad should be so adjusted that they would yield but a fair return upon the investment made in the property? No one would question that, I am sure. It has been done a great many times, and I have never heard of any man with enough temerity to question that kind of regulation. That is the very heart of regulation. It is the whole purpose of regulation to protect the public against excessive charges for transportation. But we have more than one railroad. If we had but the Pennsylvania road and the Atchison road and the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy road and the New York Central road it would be easy to attach to them rates that would only make a return of 5½ per cent or 6 per cent upon the value of their property. No one would doubt that we had a right to do that; but, having the right to exercise that authority, we are powerless to exercise it. Why? We can not do it because lying side by side with these strong, prosperous roads there are other roads which must be maintained and which can not survive under the rates which will enable the roads I have first mentioned to live successfully.

When we come, therefore, to regulate these properties, we can not regulate them upon the theory that they alone occupy the field of transportation. For the good of the public we must take into account the necessities and needs of all the people of the country. So we are compelled, in the very necessities of the case, to allow these larger railroad companies to collect rates which in so far as they are concerned are unreasonably high, in order to enable the less fortunately situated roads to live and operate at all.

So what do we do? For the permanent system, you will remember, I have proposed the only thing that can be done, and that is consolidation; but for the transitory period, what we have done is to say to these larger roads: "We are making rates which are too high so far as you are concerned if you alone were to be considered. We will allow you to collect these rates, but in so far as they exceed an income of 6 per cent upon the value of your property, you are a trustee for the public, and must respond to your trusteeship and pay over the excess to the Government of the United States for such disposition as it may see fit to make of the fund." It is not true that these revenues, simply because they come into the hands of the larger railroad companies under a system of rates which have been established by the commission, are the absolute property of these companies.

If I were to grant that these revenues became the absolute property of the railroad companies which received them under the regulations which we have established, then the conclusion of the distinguished ex-Justice of the Supreme Court would be invulnerable; but if the bill to which I refer has any merit at all, as I hope it has, one of its merits is that it does not permit that surplus to become the property of the railroads into whose treasuries it happens to fall.

I have no question at all with regard to either the justice of the provision or its constitutionality. We have pursued this narrow, cramped, and restrictive policy long enough. If Congress is not able to lift itself above the murky prejudices of former years, and examine transportation from a national standpoint, and establish those regulations which are necessary for the welfare of all the people, we must either go at once to Government ownership and operation or leave the railway companies untrammeled and unrestricted to impose on the people of the country for their service just such charges as they may think best.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator whether this surplus which is to be kept outside of the railroad earnings, and used to promote the earnings of weak railroads, is to be used in the district in which it is accumulated, or may it go anywhere?

Mr. CUMMINS. It may go anywhere.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is there justification for taking away from the people of a certain territory for the use of the railroads in that territory an amount of money that is not needed to produce proper earnings and allowing that money to be taken to a distant part of the United States to develop railroad interests there?

Mr. CUMMINS. When you consider that this district will probably be a very large one, I do not see any more injustice in permitting an excess earning that may come from the New York Central Railroad to be used in the State of Kansas than in permitting it to be used in New England, or in the lower half of Pennsylvania, or in the lower half of Indiana. I think that we must look at transportation as a unit; nor would I be willing to concede that the people along the line of the New York Central Road are any more interested in the development of the commerce of the lower half of Pennsylvania, or the lower half of Ohio or Indiana, than they are in the development of the commerce of Illinois, Nebraska, or Kansas. That at least is my view of the measure. I do not think it can be unjust if the earning railroad company retains all that under a free and unrestricted regulation, unaccompanied by the presence of other carriers, it would be entitled to earn in any event. However, that is likely to create considerable difference of opinion, and I only hope that those who have studied the matter will discuss it just as freely and candidly as though I had no feelings whatever, because there is not any criticism that will offend me with regard to this matter. It is too big a subject. We must do what is right with respect to it, without regard to anybody's preconceived opinions.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. It might be suggested that these traffic districts are liable to be changed from time to time and are merely established by the commission because of a certain similarity of the earnings in the different districts which makes it more convenient for the commission to regulate the rates and more just to the public, because, for instance, New England is what might be called a great switching district, with short hauls, and has a different basis of rates; but it can be hardly said to be unjust if any one road earns more than a fair income that the surplus which is taken by the Government may be used where it is most needed.

Mr. CUMMINS. The remarks of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] are very pertinent, and it is quite true that the rate districts of one year might not be the rate districts of the next.

Mr. President, in the natural development of this subject I would next take up what are known as the labor provisions of this bill, embracing what has been accepted throughout the country as the antistrike section. But with the permission of the Senate I will pass that until to-morrow, and I hope it will not take me long to consider it. I would like to finish to-night the review of the bill with the exception of the labor provisions.

Mr. President, the bill provides for the organization of a transportation board. I have already described its duties so far as the division of the railways of the country into systems is concerned. This board has other and many important duties. I beg simply a reading of the bill in that respect, because it would consume time, without any important result, to go over these various details.

Section 24 of the bill relates to the issuance of railway securities. For years there has been a constant and general demand that in some way or other the Federal Government shall undertake the supervision of the issuance of railway securities. A bill to that end passed the House at one time and was reported favorably by the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate. However, it did not receive consideration in the Senate, and therefore never became a law. But I think there is no real opposition to a provision which confers upon the Interstate Commerce Commission or some other Federal agency the supervision of the issuance of railway securities, in that way relieving the railway companies of the regulation of 40 of the 48 States of the Union. I think there are about 40 States in the Union which have laws regulating the issuance of railway securities. This is intended to concentrate that power in the hands of a Federal tribunal.

Section 34 is an enlargement of the car-service act, which it is unnecessary for me to read or comment upon at any great length. You will find in the rewriting of this important section, I believe, one of the most important amendments of the interstate-commerce act. You will remember the car-service act was passed, I think, in 1917, and was intended to give to the Government a larger function with respect to the movement of commodities, the movement of trains, the supply of cars, and all matters pertaining to the general disposition of our commerce. I need not dwell upon this section, because it will present very little, I think, that will awaken opposition from any quarter. I may remark, however, that it is in this section that we have attempted to give the Government the right to prevent construction of new lines. The very difficulties we have heard urged here so often have arisen at times because railroads have been constructed where and when they ought not to have been constructed. So we have given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, in connection with the board, the jurisdiction to prevent the construction of new lines where obviously the construction would simply impose another burden upon the public without adding anything to the public welfare.

We have also given to the Government wider and broader power with respect to furnishing adequate and safe facilities, so that the commission or the board can command railroad companies to equip their lines with proper facilities and to procure the necessary cars and engines to transact their business with promptitude, all the while, of course, conditioned upon the power of the companies to comply with the demands or the commands of the Government. It would be idle to require a company that could not secure the money with which to do it to buy additional cars or additional engines, or anything of that kind. But the fullest and broadest powers are given to the commission in this section, and I may call that to the attention of the Senate later on.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose the State of North Carolina desired to construct a railroad with its convict system up through the mountains of North Carolina to reach a part of the State in which there are no railroad facilities. I understand that this board would have the right to prevent such a railroad from being built?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, not at all, if the railroad did not want to do any interstate business.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose they wapted to connect with a line in another State?

Mr. CUMMINS. Then it would have to get the consent of the Government.

Mr. OVERMAN. The State would have to get the consent of the Government?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, after the construction of the roadbed, in order to put a mortgage on it for its rails and its equipment, it would have to come before this board to get its approval?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the provision in the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. So far as the provision of the bill which provides for the regulation of the securities is concerned, I think every State commission in the United States indorsed it, on the ground that that system of regulation of the issuance of securities must be in some one central authority, and uniform, on account of the fact that so many roads will run into various States.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know, Mr. President, that it shocks one when we think of the full power of regulating commerce, but I really do not know any way to divide it. We have tried hard and labored earnestly to preserve to the States all the authority that can possibly be preserved. But when the Federal Government undertakes to regulate commerce among the States it can not divide that authority with the States.

If the Federal Government believes that a road should not be constructed because that road would cast upon the general public an unnecessary burden, the responsibility for that decision can not be shared by the State and the Federal tribunals, and we have thought that justice to the whole country would be more likely to be secured through the jurisdiction of the Federal tribunal than through the State tribunal.

We have rewritten in section 37 what is known as the long-and-short-haul clause. That will give rise undoubtedly to some discussion. We have not adopted the positive, rigid, long-haul provision. We still permit, under section 37 of the bill, some discretion on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission. We have said to the Interstate Commerce Commission that it could grant the privilege to any company to charge more for a shorter than for a longer distance in the same direction, but that in doing so the rate for the longer distance must be found by the commission to be a compensatory rate. The significance of that change ought to be borne in mind, because there are a good many Senators who will be interested in the provision who are not in the Senate at this moment.

I assume that they have delegated to some one else the responsibility of taking care of the interests of their sections. I do not know. But, at any rate, I do not want any of them to complain hereafter that there has not been laid before the Senate a full and complete exposition of what the committee has done with regard to this very vital and important subject.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will excuse me, I think that is one of the most important questions we have, and I would like to have some information as to the classification districts. To give a concrete example, under the old law they could ship a barrel of molasses through my town from New Orleans, coming north, to Lynchburg or Norfolk, Va., cheaper than they could ship it to my town, 300 miles nearer. They could ship it to Lynchburg and ship it back to my town, 300 miles, and save money on it in freight. How will this long-and-short-haul provision regulate that?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will try to describe that to the Senator. I think the practice that he has just described has been almost universal, and it is absolutely indefensible, and so far as I am concerned I have been for years in favor of a positive long-and-short-haul clause; that is, if I could have my way about it, I would declare that the railroad companies shall not under any circumstances charge more for a shorter than a longer distance for like commodities in the same direction over the same railroad. But that was not the view of the committee, and, as I said a few moments ago, I intend to do the best I can to sustain the work which the committee has done, for it has done it in the most painstaking way, and I have never known such continuous and such absorbing consideration given to any legislative measure as has been given by the Committee on Interstate Commerce to the measure now before the Senate.

But I will attempt to describe to the Senator from North Carolina what this bill will do in a case such as he suggests. At the present time the Interstate Commerce Commission in granting to various railroads the right to charge more for a shorter than for a longer distance for like commodities on the same line have said, especially with regard to water competition, that if the rate charged by the railway company for the longer distance defrays what is known as the out-of-pocket cost it may be sustained and the permission to make the charge may be given. It is in that respect that the present bill changes the existing law. We have said in this bill that the Interstate Commerce Commission can give the authority to charge more for the longer than the shorter haul; but in giving the authority it must find that the rate which is charged by the railway company for the longer distance is a compensatory rate as distinguished from an out-of-pocket cost rate. There is a great deal of difference between those two things.

A compensatory rate, I assume, means a rate which will enable the railway company charging it to defray the cost of maintenance and operation and that will also bear its just share of the return upon capital. I take it that the word "compensatory" is used in that sense. Therefore, in the case put by the Senator from North Carolina, if the charge for the longer distance was not a compensatory charge, the Interstate Commerce Commission would have no authority to grant the right to charge more for transporting the sugar, or whatever it may have been, over the shorter distance than it charged for transporting it over the longer distance. I think this amendment will go very far toward correcting the manifest abuses which have crept into the law. I think that the Interstate Commerce Commission could have prevented very many of those abuses by proper and correct rulings upon the law as it is, although I do not criticize it in that respect, for its work has been very difficult.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is framed without regard to water transportation. I think the claim has been made heretofore that the reason for the discrimination against my State was because of the water transportation at Norfolk.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes. Now, it will not be permitted to use the cost of water transportation as a basis for reducing its rates to the terminal point and charge more in the home or in the State of the Senator from North Carolina, unless it finds that the rate which the railroad charges on account of the Norfolk water competition is a compensatory rate.

We can easily imagine that if the Interstate Commerce Commission finds that the rate is compensatory for the longer distance it will be rather difficult for it to maintain the proposition that the higher rate for the shorter distance is a reasonable rate. That is the way I think many of the abuses that have found their way into the administration of this law will be corrected.

I pass now to section 38——

Mr. STANLEY. At that point may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. What will affect the question even more than water competition is the situation of two roads having common termini, one road being much longer than the other, and an absolute enforcement of the long-and-short-haul clause would deprive one of those roads of all proper rates to the termini of the longer road.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad the Senator from Kentucky mentions that, because it reminds me of another modification that we have made in section 4 of the interstate-commerce act. It is that where there are two competitive land lines, one longer than the other, that under no circumstances must the longer line charge more to an intermediate point not farther from the origin than the haul on the short line than it charges for the competitive point. It must not charge more for the same distance than the rate charged on the short line. That, I think, will also correct a good many injustices that have occurred in the application of the law as it exists.

Mr. SHEPPARD. May I ask the Senator a question at that point?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the Senator include water transportation lines in any of the systems provided in the bill, or does he leave them separate and distinct?

Mr. CUMMINS. We do not bring all-water transportation within the provisions of the bill. We do not change the law in that respect. I take it that the Senator from Texas means have we brought the port-to-port business within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; or the business on any of the rivers.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; we have not. There is now, and has been for quite a long time, as the Senator from Texas knows, jurisdiction on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rates upon transportation that is partly by rail and partly by water, but we have not enlarged the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission in that respect at all. It remains just where it is now.

Mr. SHEPPARD. You have not made any of the water-transportation lines part of these railroad systems?

Mr. CUMMINS. No. The bill makes no changes in that respect, so far as I know.

Section 38 is an amendment——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator permit me, before he starts on that feature of the bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have been examining the bill with reference to the water routes, and I find different provisions in it which I have not been able to study sufficiently to determine just how far the committee does intend to go or how far it does go in regard to water regulation.

On pages 26 and 27 of the print of the bill I find a statement that it is "declared to be the policy of Congress to promote, encourage, and develop water transportation, service, and facilities," and so forth. Also, "with that end in view the board shall inquire into water-transportation facilities both for internal and external commerce," and so forth.

I suppose that would include a broad inquiry with reference to ocean transportation?

Mr. CUMMINS. As broad as might be made.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It provides further that the board—> shall investigate the appropriate types of boats suitable for different classes of waterways; also the subject of water terminals, both for water traffic and for through traffic by water and rail, including the necessary docks—

And so forth.

What is the object or purpose of the provision—> shall investigate the appropriate types of boats suitable for different classes of waterways.

Is it the purpose to allow the board to investigate suitable types and determine the suitable types of boats for water transportation?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no authority to determine anything.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What is intended by that?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is intended by that to promote water transportation, to increase our external commerce, to acquire all the information possible that can be used to enlarge our commerce. That provision was put into the bill at the earnest insistance of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], who stands as a sort of godfather for water transportation. We put it into the bill believing that there ought to be some sort of recognition of the growing demand for water competition and water transportation. We thought that we were meeting a real need in our regulatory system to include within it some concern for water transportation, which has hitherto been substantially neglected and forgotten.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wanted to ask the Senator whether the words "shall investigate the appropriate types of boats suitable for different classes of waterways" were intended by the committee to include the class of boats on the ocean?

Mr. CUMMINS. Surely.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Or whether that relates more particularly to inland waterways?

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that the authority would be exercised oftener with reference to inland waterways than to exterior or ocean-going ships.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We have a Shipping Board, created by the shipping act, that has very wide authority with reference to ocean transportation and ships, and I wondered whether or not it was the intention of the committee in framing this bill to trench upon or invade the jurisdiction or authority of the Shipping Board, or whether it was really intended to confine it to inland waterways?

Mr. CUMMINS. It was not in my mind to confine it to inland waterways, nor was it in my mind to trench upon or invade the authority or jurisdiction of the Shipping Board in any fashion. We have not given to the transportation board or to the Interstate Commerce Commission any power over ocean commerce that would interfere in any way with the authority of the Shipping Board, but inasmuch as the advocates of water transportation were so anxious that we should put something into the bill that would recognize the value of water transportation, we could see no objection to giving the transportation board the authority to examine and to inquire.

I do not know whether the Senator from Washington will remember or not, but the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] introduced an amendment to the bill which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and in that amendment the authority which the Senator from Washington has just read was given to the Department of Commerce. We put it into the bill, simply changing "the Department of Commerce" to "the transportation board," otherwise practically accepting the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, I did not know of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana. I am in hearty sympathy with any movement looking toward the improvement and use and development of our waterway transportation. I would not seriously object to having proper provisions in the bill if they could be framed in proper shape to do that, but in doing it I would not want to put in the instrumentalities created by this bill authority that is already in the hands of another board and provided by permanent legislation to be exercised by another board or body.

I would be perfectly willing to have a provision in the bill, as I say, putting whatever additional power is necessary with a board already established, but I do not like to see a duplication of authority that exists in one board already created by law apparently being placed in another board.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Washington mean authority to look into the subject?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not really see any necessity of authorizing a board to look into a subject when another board has been created for the purpose of looking into the same subject. For instance, on page 28 I find this provision:

> It shall also be the province and duty of the board to compile, publish, and supply from time to time such useful statistics, data, and information concerning transportation by water as may be of value to the commercial interest of the country, and make such annual recommendations to Congress for the regulation and improvement of transportation by water as it deems advisable.

I suppose it might be said it is well to get the recommendation of all authorities that we can with reference to the methods of improving water transportation, but the Shipping Board is expressly directed to investigate these things and make recommendation to Congress annually. I doubt the advisability of directing another board to do the same thing.

Mr. CUMMINS. There may be very great merit in the suggestion offered by the Senator from Washington. I personally do not feel that the clause to which he has brought my attention is of any great value to anyone. If he shall in the course of the consideration of the bill move to strike it out, I only hope he will wait until the Senator from Louisiana is here.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know that I would even do that, but I wanted to get the views of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. The views of the committee, I think, were that we were responding to what seemed to be a reasonable request upon the part of a Senator whose life has been given to the study and development of water transportation and whose heart is closely bound up in the development of that subject.

Mr. JONES of Washington. While I know that is true, and while the Senator from Louisiana has taken, of course, a great deal of interest in ocean transportation, I know his heart has been bound up in inland waterways.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is true.

Mr. JONES of Washington. When this bill mentions waterways here I just supposed that it probably was the intention of the committee to cover inland waterways and not to go out into the broad highways of the ocean.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to say that as one member of the committee it was my understanding that this was largely in the interest of inland transportation. The board that is created here has to deal with railroads and with water connections. It has proper jurisdiction over them. It was thought very desirable that this kind of transportation should be encouraged and that the best reports possible should be obtained. I do not remember that even once was the question of ocean transportation mentioned.

I can see some force in what the Senator from Washington says in reference to ocean transportation, but I think it is entirely proper that this provision should be inserted here as affecting inland transportation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I entirely agree with the Senator as to that.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator, in connection with the same matter, to section 45, on page 92 of the bill, where it is provided:

SEC. 45. Every ocean-going common carrier engaged in commerce with foreign nations, or in coastwise or in coast-to-coast commerce, whose ships are registered under the laws of the United States and thereby made subject to regulation under the Constitution and laws of the United States, shall file for each boat so operated with the board within 30 days after this act takes effect a schedule or schedules showing, with respect to each of its boats having regular routes and sailings, the routes over which its boats ply, its sailing dates, and the rates, fares, and charges for transportation to and from the various ports at which cargo is received or delivered. Said schedule or schedules shall state the period during which such rates, fares, and charges are to be in effect.

That is all required in the shipping-board act.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg the pardon of the Senator from Washington, but I do not so understand.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. CUMMINS. This is purely a provision intended for the regulation of the railroads, but the railroads must get the information, of course, from the carriers by water. The water carrier, the ocean carrier, is required to file with the transportation board these schedules, so that the transportation board can compile them and compel the land carrier to distribute the information at the stations in the interior, thus affording the inland shipper who desires to export an opportunity properly to route and ship his freight.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator probably is correct. I understand the purpose of the provision, at any rate; but there is one other question that I wish to ask in connection with the same section, in order that I may secure an understanding of it. On page 93 it is provided:

When any consignor delivers a shipment of property, at any place specified by the board, to be delivered by the railway carrier to one of the boats above mentioned for transportation by water from and to a port named in its aforesaid schedule, the railway carrier shall issue a through bill of lading to the point of destination, naming not only the charge to be paid for the land transportation but also for the water transportation.

It is not intended there, I assume, that the board or the rail carrier shall fix the charge.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I understood it and as I intended it—and I drew that section; it is something entirely new in the law—neither the board, nor the commission, nor the land carrier is to have any authority whatever over the rates which are to be charged by the ocean carriers for the service. I would be as much opposed to that as anyone.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought the Senator would, but I rather think that these provisions need to be examined very carefully. I have not had the opportunity to do so as yet.

Mr. CUMMINS. I may say to the Senator from Washington that I want him to know exactly where the suggestion came from.

One of the chief assistants, I think, of the Shipping Board for some time, a Mr. Rossiter, whose experience has been very great and whose judgment I very highly esteem, is the real author of that section. He is not the author of the language of the section, but he is the author of the idea, which I regard as one of the most helpful things that have ever been presented for the increase of our foreign commerce. If there is anything wrong with the composition of the section, I want to correct it. I do not want, nor was it my purpose at all, to draw the ocean carrier within the jurisdiction of either the transportation board or the Interstate Commerce Commission; but I do want to put a command on the ocean carrier to give to the transportation board its sailing dates and its routes in order that the board may compel the land carrier to furnish that information to those who desire to use the ocean service.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have conferred with Mr. Rossiter in regard to the provision, and the Senator is correct as to his being a strong advocate of some provision of this kind, but whether he is the suggester of it I am not prepared to say.

Mr. CUMMINS. He is, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I had the idea in mind, I know, long before I talked with him.

Mr. CUMMINS. I presume that is undoubtedly true; but he is the first man who ever mentioned it to me.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no doubt that many others thought of it long before it entered my mind, but I know that I prepared a provision along this very line and incorporated it in a bill which I introduced quite a while ago with reference to shipping.

I remember that Mr. Rossiter talked to me about the matter and stated that he had talked to the Senator from Iowa. I told him that, so far as I was concerned, I would make no question as to the jurisdiction of the committee if a proper provision of that kind were prepared and inserted in this bill, because I consider it of very great importance and the sooner we can get it enacted into law I think the better. So I have no quarrel with the attempt to cover it in this bill. All that I want is that we be careful to see that we get a proper provision and one that will carry out the idea entertained, I think, by the Senator from Iowa as well as by myself.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sure of that. The Senator from Washington and myself can not have any disagreement about the jurisdiction of our respective committees when we are both endeavoring to accomplish a common purpose.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. The inquiry of the Senator from Washington as to the jurisdiction of the transportation board should, in my opinion, be read in connection with the first section of the bill. In the light of that section I agree with the chairman of the committee that the jurisdiction of the transportation board is advisory. The first section of the bill provides:

The rights and interests of the United States acquired by the President under section 6 of the act hereby repealed, authorizing expenditures for the utilization and operation of canals or for the purchase, construction, or utilization and operation of boats, barges, tugs, and other transportation facilities on the inland, canal, and coastwise waterways, which shall include the boats constructed or authorized to be constructed for the navigation of the Mississippi River above St. Louis, are hereby transferred to the United States Shipping Board and shall be dealt with in accordance with the rights and interests so acquired and under the provisions of the act known as the "shipping act, 1916."

Then it proceeds to provide for the payment of various sums of money.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is quite true; but the Senator from Kentucky will remember that the scope of the provision which he has just read is limited to the property acquired by the Government under section 6 of the Federal-control act, and to that extent the whole jurisdiction passes over to the Shipping Board. The Senator is quite right.

[At this point Mr. CUMMINS ended his speech for the day.]

Thursday, December 4, 1919.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. Before the Senator enters upon the speech which he said he would conclude this morning I should like to ask him one question in regard to section 18, the paragraph on page 41 commencing with line 5. That part provides:

All property, property rights, contract rights, and assets of every kind owned or possessed by any such corporation reincorporating hereunder shall, by virtue of such reincorporation and of this act and without additional proceeding, formality, or act whatsoever, become and be immediately vested in such reincorporated company—and all debts, liabilities, contracts, obligations, liens, claims, and rights of whatsoever kind of any corporation which shall become reincorporated under the provisions of this act shall continue unimpaired.

And this is the part to which I want to call the Senator's attention—

Now, in case a corporation is organized in a State and has a State charter, and that charter requires that the corporation shall for a number of years or for all time maintain offices or headquarters or shops in that State, I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa if under that part of this section they would be compelled to keep that obligation or would a further amendment be required to compel them to maintain their offices, shops, and headquarters as required in the charter or in the agreement by which bonds might have been voted to the company?

Mr. CUMMINS. The precise question suggested by the Senator from Kansas did not, as I remember it, arise before the committee. My answer to it must be, therefore, purely a personal one.

It is my understanding that this section or the part of the section read by the Senator from Kansas means that every lawful, enforcible obligation passes to the reincorporated company and can be enforced against the reincorporated company. I am bound to say that the precise contract to which the Senator from Kansas refers is one the validity of which I very much doubt. It may be that there are decisions with which I am not familiar, but I doubt whether a contract in which a common carrier agrees to maintain offices or shops in a particular place could be enforced against the public interest or against the public welfare.

But I suppose we need not pass upon that question, and, broadly speaking, I answer the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] by saying that the reincorporated company would assume all valid obligations into which its predecessor had entered.

Mr. President, when I closed the discussion last evening, I was referring to the modification which this bill contains of what is popularly known as the long-and-short-haul clause of the act to regulate commerce. I think I had explained it as fully as is necessary, but if any Senator has any inquiry with regard to that particular subject I should be very glad to respond further. If there is no such inquiry, I pass to section 38 of the bill. It will be understood, Mr. President, that I am not attempting to enter into every detail of the bill. Senators must advise themselves, as I hope they will, or as I assume they have, by reading the bill, but I am simply attempting to mention the prominent and, as I am inclined to believe, the important changes which, if the bill passes, it will make in the law.

We are all familiar with what is known as the antipooling section of the interstate-commerce act. I may say, in passing, that in this respect there is no essential difference between the bill which has passed the other House and the bill now before the Senate. The bill adds to section 5 of the act to regulate interstate commerce the provision which I shall read; but in order that it may be fully understood I will read the law as it now is:

SEC. 5 (as amended Aug. 24, 1912). That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to enter into any contract, agreement, or combination with any other common carrier or carriers for the pooling of freights of different and competing railroads, or to divide between them the aggregate or net proceeds of the earnings of such railroads, or any portion thereof; and in any case of an agreement for the pooling of freights as aforesaid, each day of its continuance shall be deemed a separate offense.

That is the law at the present time. The change that is proposed in this section of the act to regulate commerce is to insert after the word "that" the words:

Except upon specific approval by order of the commission as in this section provided.

Then there is added the following:

Provided, That whenever the commission shall be of the opinion, after hearing, upon application of any carrier or carriers, by railway or water, subject to this act, that the division of traffic or earnings between any such carrier or carriers will be in the interest of better service to the public, economy in operation, or otherwise of advantage to the convenience of commerce and the people, and will tend to equalize earnings between the said carriers and will not unduly restrain competition, the commission shall have authority, by order, to approve and authorize such division of traffic or earnings between carriers under such rules and regulations, and for such consideration as between said carriers and upon such terms and conditions, and for such length of time, as shall be found by the commission to be just and reasonable in terms.

The commission may from time to time, for good cause shown, make such supplemental orders in the premises as it may deem necessary or appropriate, and may by any such supplemental order modify or set aside the provisions of any previous order as to the extent of the division, or as to the rules, regulations, terms, conditions, or consideration currently moving in respect of any such divisions so theretofore approved and authorized. The same procedure as to filing of applications and serving of notice of hearing upon proper State authorities with opportunity to be heard shall be had as is provided in section 24 of this act relating to "securities."

The portion of the act to which the last reference is made is, substantially, that upon application for the issuance of securities the Interstate Commerce Commission must notify the governor of the State and every State which may be interested or which may be concerned in the proposed action of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This provision requires also a notice to be served upon the governor of the State, and, through him, upon the authorities empowered to regulate commerce in that State, of the pendency of any application of the character I have described.

It is apparent, Mr. President, that this provision is not only an important one but is a radical departure from the policy which we have heretofore pursued. It is intended in this way to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority, practically, to unify the railroads of the country prior to the consolidation which is provided for in the bill. All of us have observed—we must have observed, if we are not blind—that the one great advantage of Government ownership is the unification which may take place and the ability on the part of common carriers to choose that route for the traffic which is most economical and which will best serve the public interest. It was thought by the committee that, at least in the transition period—and this has no limitation in point of time—but especially for the transition period, the commission should have the power to control the railway companies in the respect I have just mentioned.

This is a question upon which no argument is needed; it is one upon which every man who feels an interest in the subject has reflected and upon which he must have an opinion.

I have thought it my duty to refer to it, because it is, as I have indicated, a substantial departure from the policy we have so long pursued.

Section 39 of the bill is also new and is intended to serve the convenience of shippers and promote economy in operation. As it is now under the law whenever a railroad company desires to make a change in its schedule of rates it is compelled to file with the Interstate Commerce Commission a complete new schedule, involving very great expense. That, however, is not the chief objection; it mystifies the subject in the minds of the general public. The Interstate Commerce Commission, as I understand, has recommended this provision, or some such provision as this, as it has recommended the provision to which I have just referred, namely, the authority on the part of the commission to authorize the diversion of traffic and the division of earnings as between competing carriers. The provision to which I am now referring is as follows:

That the commission is hereby authorized to make suitable rules and regulations for the simplification of schedules of rates, fares, charges, and classifications and to permit in such rules and regulations the filing of an amendment of or change in any rate, fare, charge, or classification without filing complete schedules covering rates, fares, charges, or classifications not changed if, in its judgment—

That is, the judgment of the commission—

the public will be better informed by so doing.

Any of you who have ever had occasion to trace the changes that have been made from time to time in the schedules that are filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission will recognize immediately the value of a provision of this character. In my opinion, it will in detail at least serve the most valuable purpose among those who desire to ascertain from time to time at what rates or charges shipments can be made.

I call attention next to the provision of the bill which is contained in two or three sections, and, therefore, I can not point out, and will not attempt to point out, the precise section. As it is now, the commission is not given express power to prescribe minimum rates. The commission has the power to prescribe the rate at which an article shall be moved, in order to enforce the law against discrimination, but there is no authority for a schedule of minimum rates. This bill adds to the present law the power on the part of the commission to prescribe such rates as well as maximum rates. This is particularly important with reference to the division of rates as between connecting carriers whether they be land carriers or whether one of them be a land carrier and the other a water carrier.

There has been a great deal of controversy with respect to this subject. It has gone on for years among those who are familiar with the general course of the development of the law, and this has been strongly recommended, not once but many times, by the Interstate Commerce Commission as one of the powers it ought to have in order efficiently to regulate commerce.

I call attention next to section 43, which presents also a long-standing controversy and a most important one, and upon which Senators will have, I am sure, decided opinions. I do not know whether Senators who are absent from the Chamber have any opinions upon the subject or not, or whether they care to have any opinions; but I am very sure that as the matter develops they will become interested in this particular subject.

For years there has been a conflict between the jurisdiction of the Federal Government and the jurisdiction of the State governments with regard to the adjustment of rates. All of you know that the Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress the authority to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations. Obviously, this authority is limited to the regulation or control of interstate commerce and matters that are inseparably connected with or incident to interstate commerce. The Supreme Court of the United States has had occasion in at least three separate cases to discuss the subject.

Most of you, I am sure, are familiar with what is known as the Shreveport decision. In that series of cases it was alleged that the State of Texas had established rates for intrastate traffic—that is, for the movement of traffic from one point in the State to another point in the State—which discriminated against the rates which the Interstate Commerce Commission had established for the movement of traffic from points beyond the State into the State, and the particular community which complained and which gave the name to the case I have mentioned was Shreveport. It complained that it could not do business with the State of Texas in competition with rivals located in the State, for the reason that the business men within the State were shipping freight at a much lower rate, comparatively, than the Interstate Commerce Commission had found to be reasonable from Shreveport into the State.

I need not follow that case in all its phases; but it finally reached the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court held that the authority of the Federal Government as it could be vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission extended to the removal of a discrimination between the interstate rates and the intrastate rates, but no authority had been given by Congress to the commission to declare what the intrastate rate should be in comparison with the interstate rate. Practically the same question arose in what is known as the Minnesota rate case, and similar doctrine was announced by the Supreme Court, and then it arose in what is known as the Illinois case—you all remember that—in which the passenger rate established by the Legislature of Illinois was challenged because it prescribed a rate of 2 cents a mile, whereas the interstate rate from points in Illinois to points in Missouri—St. Louis, for instance—I think was 2½ cents a mile, and the Supreme Court held that in so far as the persons and localities affected or discriminated against by rates of that character were concerned there could be relief, and the instrastate rate could be condemned by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Holding those general observations in mind, I come to the provision which the committee has made upon this subject and which it has recommended to the Senate. One more word, however, of a general character.

The committee has attempted simply to express the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. We have not attempted to carry the authority of Congress beyond the exact point ruled by the Supreme Court in the cases to which I have referred; and the only thing we have done in the matter has been to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to remove the discrimination when established in a proper proceeding before that body—an authority which it does not now have.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. The effect of section 43 would be to abolish the railroad commissions of the various States, would it not, so far as rate making is concerned?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; not at all. I think the Senator from Tennessee does not mean to imply that we have sought to abolish the State commissions or State authorities. We have not gone beyond the principle announced in the cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, and we have simply given to the commission the authority to remove the discrimination when established. As it is now, all that can be done is for the commission to go forward from time to time and condemn and enjoin the State rates until they finally reach the level which, in the judgment of the commission, is no discrimination.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, of course if the Supreme Court holds that the Interstate Commerce Commission has the right to fix intrastate rates it is just a question of time when the superior power will be exercised, and the State commissions must of necessity be of no further use.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not less so than they are now, in my opinion.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, that may be true. I am neither denying nor defending that statement. I am merely talking about the effect of the provision in this bill, and saying that in substance it will put the various State railroad commissions out of power.

Mr. CUMMINS. In my opinion, no. I think there will be a wide, important field for the State commissions under any circumstances. I think there is a broad field which we can not occupy under our constitutional authority. However, I will read now the provision which we recommend:

Whenever in any investigation under the provisions of this act there shall be brought in issue any rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice made or imposed by authority of any State, the commission, before proceeding to hear and dispose of such issue—

I pause there to say that no one can question that the jurisdiction to determine whether there is a discrimination must necessarily rest in the United States.

Before proceeding to hear and dispose of such issue, shall cause such State or States to be notified of the proceeding. The commission shall confer with the authorities of any State having regulatory jurisdiction over the class of persons and corporations subject to this act with respect to the relationship between rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices of carriers subject to the jurisdiction of such State bodies and of the commission; and to that end is authorized and empowered, under rules to be prescribed by it, and which may be modified from time to time, to hold joint hearings with any such State regulating bodies on any matters wherein the commission is empowered to act and where the rate-making authority of a State is or may be affected by the action taken by the commission. The commission is also authorized to avail itself of the cooperation, services, records, and facilities of such State authorities in the enforcement of any provision of this act.

The commission shall, after full hearing, make such findings and orders as will in its judgment remove any undue or unreasonable advantage, preference, or prejudice as between persons or localities in State and interstate or foreign commerce, or any undue, unreasonable, or unjust discrimination against interstate or foreign commerce, which is hereby forbidden and declared to be unlawful, and such findings or orders shall be observed while in effect by the carriers parties to such proceeding affected thereby, and shall make the rates, fares, and charges, or the minimum and maximum of such rates, fares, and charges, and any classification, regulation, or practice which, in its judgment, will remove such advantage, preference, or prejudice.

Nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect the existing laws or powers of the States or other local authorities in relation to taxation or the lawful police powers of the several States, including the power to make and regulate intrastate rates, except as in this act otherwise provided. Any carrier shall have the right to make complaint to the commission respecting any such intrastate rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice.

With regard to the last sentence, it may be said that all other persons now have the right to make complaint, but the carrier under the law has no right to make such a complaint, and therefore it was expressly given to the carrier in this instance.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. In so far as rate making is concerned, does not the Senator think that this section at best can be called a benevolent assimilation of all the rights and powers of the State commissions as to rates? It necessarily has that effect. I notice that it provides that they shall sit with the State boards, and yet it gives the United States board the power of fixing the rate, so that it is just another way of coming to the same end. It just sugar coats the pill and takes in the State commissions. Is not that the effect of it, and must it not be, so far as rates are concerned?

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; I think that is not the effect, and I think I can convince the Senator from Tennessee in a moment that no such consequence can follow. In the first place, the Senator will remember that a very large proportion of the freight which either passes from or passes into any State is interstate commerce, and that is within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission and always has been since that body was organized. One thinks of the volume of traffic in a State as very large, and I do not want the Senator from Tennessee to imagine that we are lifting all that volume out of a jurisdiction heretofore exercised and giving it to another body, for already, I venture to say, 80 per cent of the traffic of all the States is interstate commerce, and it is only with the 20 per cent with which we have now to deal.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I understood that. But it seems to me it takes the 20 per cent in a benevolent way and turns it over to the commission provided for under the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let us see about that. Of course, we are not turning anything over. The law has already turned it over.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will excuse me a moment, I do not understand that to be the decisions in the cases he referred to. As I understood those cases, they held that Congress had the power to grant to the Interstate Commerce Commission, or to any other board, the right to regulate them, but that it had not done so, and this bill proposes to do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Supreme Court held that Congress had not conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to prescribe a rate in the stead of one which had been condemned; but so far as the condemnation of the rates is concerned, the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission is already ample, and it has succeeded in one way or another in removing the discriminations which have come under its notice without the statute which we now propose.

But following the idea of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] a little further, this only gives to the Federal authority the right to inquire into a discrimination, an unjust, undue preference, as against a locality or as against interstate commerce. I fancy that four-fifths of the traffic which is intrastate traffic has no relation whatever to interstate commerce. If I ship a bushel of potatoes from my town to a town 50 miles distant, the rate upon those potatoes can not affect interstate commerce. It is a mere estimate, but I would say that is true of four-fifths of all freight shipments within a State, and therefore the State authorities are left with entire regulating power over those shipments.

I may say, for the benefit of the Senate, and especially say to the Senator from Tennessee, that the House bill originally proposed another element; that is, it proposed that we should declare that if the rates in force in any State did not sustain a fair share of the burden which the interstate carrier must bear, then the Federal authority should have the jurisdiction to take possession of the entire field and lift the rates so that the carrier should receive from intrastate business a proper share of the revenues which it must have in order to pay for maintenance and operation and a fair return upon the value of the property. That is the contention, and there is a great deal of merit in it. We have not thought, however, that we were justified in going to that extent. But I predict that it will not be many years before Congress will be compelled to go to that length.

For instance, here is a railroad company, we will say, running from New York to Chicago. It runs through New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and a part of Illinois. A large part of its traffic is interstate, and therefore within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the commission can fix whatever rates upon that business it deems reasonable and just.

But New Jersey fixes a rate upon her traffic which this interstate carrier must transport. Pennsylvania fixes a rate upon her traffic which the interstate carrier must transport. Ohio does the like; Indiana does likewise, and so does Illinois. The interstate carrier must be maintained. It has a certain cost of maintenance and operation. It has a certain capital invested in its business, and the revenues from that business must be sufficient to defray the cost of operation and maintenance and to make a fair return upon the value of the property or upon the investment.

Now, assume that the States of New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, and Ohio, and Indiana, and Illinois shall fix a level of rates which does not furnish to that carrier a fair share, considering the cost of the service, of the entire sum which must be received in order that the carrier may go on and fulfill its duty, as I have described. What is the result? If the State rates are immune from investigation and control on the part of the Federal Government, upon that ground the interstate rates must be increased so that the entire revenues of the carrier will be sufficient to enable it to discharge the obligations which I have so many times described. That is manifestly unfair, it is obviously unjust, and we are driven at once to the inquiry, what jurisdiction shall determine the sufficiency of the State rates in producing the revenues which will constitute a fair share of the entire necessary income?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment, and I will yield. In my judgment, in the end we will be compelled to go, and I believe under the Constitution we have the authority to go, to the Federal jurisdiction for the purpose of determining that issue, just as we go to the Federal jurisdiction to determine every issue which arises in a conflict between a State authority and a Federal authority. I now yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator pointed out what would be left to the State commissions in the matter of intrastate rates. Manifestly, if this bill passes as it is written, with the provisions in it allowing the railroads to pool, allowing and providing for the physical connections of railroads, it must be apparent, with the preceding provisions, that under section 43 there will be nothing left, because every rate will be affected directly or indirectly with an interstate proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not agree with the Senator from Tennessee in his conclusion. In his inference that this bill does broaden Federal authority over interstate carriers I not only agree but I am endeavoring, as best I can, in all that I have said to demonstrate the necessity of broadening and widening Federal authority. But I do not want it to be understood that we have yet gone, and this bill does not propose to go, to the limit of our constitutional power. It leaves with the State authorities many things which, in my judgment, if we were to exercise our full power we could withdraw from the States. But the committee has not considered it wise to withdraw more than seemed to be absolutely necessary under existing conditions. At any rate, Senators will now fully understand, I think, the operation of the section to which I have referred.

The next section to which I call your attention is section 44, and in that section the only change that is of importance at this moment is in the length of time that the commission may suspend rates which are filed by the carrier.

As the law now is, each carrier has a right, and is required, if it desires to change the rates, to file its schedule of rates with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The commission can then, upon summary investigation or inquiry, suspend those rates pending an investigation. Under the law as it is it has the authority to suspend them for 120 days, and then it was given the authority, as I recollect it, if it did not finish the inquiry within that time, to extend the time for another period of six monhs. The latter period has been shortened in this bill to a period of 30 days.

The reason for that is this: In the first place, the Interstate Commerce Commission has been overworked. There is no body of men in the employ of the Government, or exercising governmental functions, upon which so great a weight of labor has fallen as the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it is utterly impossible for it to fulfill its full duties as the law now is. But we have undertaken in this bill to create a new governmental function known as the transportation board, and we have given to that board many of the important duties which are now performed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and endeavored in that way to relieve the latter body of some of its labor; and we hope that we have accomplished that purpose to such an extent as that the commission will be able promptly to decide all the matters which are brought before it.

Broadly speaking, we have left with the Interstate Commerce Commission what might be described as semi or quasi judicial powers, rate making in all its phases, the valuation of railroad property in all its aspects, accounting absolutely necessary as an incident to rate making and to valuation. These are in the main the great branches of labor which are left with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The purely administrative duties, those duties which have to do with the physical operation of the railway properties, are transferred to the transportation board and many new duties are also given to the transportation board, one of which and probably the most important of which I commented upon yesterday.

In view of this division of labor between the commission and the transportation board, the committee is of the opinion that the commission ought to pass upon the rates which are filed with it by the carriers at least within a period of five months. It is not fair either to the shipping public or to the carriers that a proposal for an increase or decrease of rates, as the case may be, shall remain uncertain and undisposed of for a period of more than five months. The provision is a limit of 120 days in the first instance, and then an extension, if necessary, of 30 days.

In the latter part of section 44 there is another very important change in the law which I want Senators to observe. Under the interstate-commerce act which now is, as you all know, the shipper may determine the route which his traffic shall take. It has been rather common in the past for railroad companies which were not satisfied with the routing which the shipper had determined upon to deliberately and knowingly divert it to some other line with which the initial carrier or some connecting carrier had more intimate relations than with the carrier over whose lines the shipper determined his traffic should go. There has been no remedy for that, and it has been practiced mainly at the expense of the short or weaker lines.

The committee determined to correct it and has corrected it by providing that the line from which the traffic is thus diverted shall be entitled to recover its proportion of the earnings from the through rate just the same as if it had carried the traffic, and the line over which the traffic may actually go wrongfully will have the satisfaction of doing the business for nothing, a penalty which I think will very soon bring to an end this very objectionable practice.

I desire now to mention briefly section 45. This is a section concerning which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and I had some colloquy last night. It is entirely new, and it is an effort to coordinate land and ocean traffic. We have not given to the Interstate Commerce Commission any authority to regulate or control or to fix rates for what is known as port-to-port traffic, whether inland or exterior, and we do not propose to do so. Everybody understands that we can not put upon ocean traffic or coastwise or coast-to-coast traffic or even upon river traffic the same regulations that are very advisable with regard to land traffic. I need not go further into that, because it is familiar to everybody.

We are now hoping to enlarge our foreign business. We are endeavoring to make it as easy as possible for the business men of America to ship their goods anywhere throughout the world. The Shipping Board is trying, I think faithfully, to establish a series of ocean routes with boats having regular sailings and regular routes as well.

The great corporations of the country, the great producers, such as the United States Steel Corporation or other corporations of that character, are able to maintain their agents everywhere, who serve as a medium of information to such shippers, and they know when the boats sail and where they go and what the rates are, and are in every way able to reach a foreign country or foreign countries in the most convenient way. That is not true of the small shippers of the land. They do not know when these boats sail and where they go. They do not know what the ordinary rates are upon these ocean-going ships.

Section 45 provides that every ocean-going steamer and every coastwise or coast-to-coast steamer with a regular route and with regular sailings shall file with the transportation board a schedule containing the dates of the sailings of its ships and the routes over which its ships travel, together with the ordinary rates which are charged for transportation. These schedules are required to be filed with the transportation board, and they are then given to the land carriers, the railroads, and the railway companies are required to maintain that compilation of information in every office designated by the transportation board. It is the thought of the committee that the board would designate the important or the chief centers of production and of shipment.

Then any man who has a shipment destined for some foreign port, for Liverpool, Hongkong, Melbourne, or for San Francisco or New Orleans, even though he may not be able to maintain a commission man at the port or any other of the conveniences which the great shippers enjoy, may take to any railroad office in the country his shipment, less than carload if you please, and deliver it to the land carrier, and the land carrier must issue to him a through bill of lading. It then becomes the duty of the land carrier to deliver the shipment to the boat in whose care it is consigned, and the land carrier must absorb in the charge for the land carriage the cost of transfer from the railway train to the boat. In that way we will have established all over the United States a system which I think will tend to increase largely our export trade or coast-to-coast trade.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. At least it will greatly serve the convenience of the people of the country without any additional cost. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I rose merely to say that, in my judgment, this is one of the best and most far-reaching provisions of the bill. Especially to inland cities of the United States is it most important that there should be such a provision. It is known to all of us that for quite a while the railroads have declined to give through bills of lading, and this provision will remedy that most serious defect in our system and, I believe, will add tremendously to the business that America will get.

I desire to offer my very hearty commendation of this section of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that is true; but this is a question that occurs to me: A man living inland ships a bale of cotton to Liverpool; he gets a through bill of lading. The vessel will not take that bale of cotton unless it is compressed. Therefore when it comes from some inland point in my State it has to be unloaded at Wilmington and then compressed and reshipped. Under the provisions of this bill will the railroad company give a through bill of lading from some little point out in my State and then take the cotton off at Wilmington and have it compressed and then put it on its train again?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not. I think the cotton will have to be so baled or so prepared as to be capable of shipment upon the ocean voyage.

Mr. OVERMAN. It always has been done in that way. They will not take it for ocean voyage unless it is compressed. We could arrange for a through bill of lading, and then have them take that bale of cotton off at the point of shipment and have it compressed and then sent on its ocean voyage.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that would be a very good arrangement, although we have not attempted to impose that duty upon the carrier.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to say in this connection that recently there has been marvelous improvement in compressing machinery in this country. We have compressors where cotton can be compressed at the gin or at the source, and that difficulty will be largely obviated as soon as the new compressing machinery is added at the various plants.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have now, with one exception, completed my explanation of the bill before the Senate. That exception is the part of the bill which proposes that the Government shall adjudicate the disputes which may arise between employees of railway companies and the corporations, and which forbids a conspiracy or combination for the purpose of preventing the movement of commodities in interstate commerce.

I venture to say that no provision in any bill submitted to Congress in recent years has been more generally discussed throughout the country than the one to which I have just referred. There are some very extravagant praises for it; there are some very unjust denunciations of it. I look upon it as a vital part not only of this bill but a vital part of our policy in the future so far as the basic industries of America are concerned. The committee has endeavored to find a solution of one of the most complicated and difficult problems ever presented to a legislative body. I am not prepared to affirm that the committee has discovered the only solution, and I am sure its members will be very glad to receive from Senators any suggestions that may make the arrangement which we have provided for more just or more efficient; but I speak for substantially every member of the committee, a very large majority of the committee, when I say that it is our profound conviction that the civilization of America—I was about to say the civilization of the world—can not continue, can not endure, unless organized society can find some plan to preserve industrial peace and order. To me the thought that to accomplish justice for those who may be interested in any dispute it is necessary to either freeze or starve the American people is unthinkable and intolerable.

I have always, I believe, entertained for men who worked not sympathy—for men who work need no sympathy—but I believe that I have always held for them the keenest interest in the struggles in which they have been engaged and the most sanguine hope of their ultimate success in obtaining the justice to which I believe they are entitled. But that does not settle this controversy.

Look at the situation now. I received a telegram this morning from one of the important cities in my State in which it was stated that the schools had all been closed; that the churches had all been closed; that every industrial enterprise had ceased—and it is a city of 25,000 people or more—and that if relief were not given in furnishing fuel before Saturday night there would be hundreds of homes in the community without heat. Our Government is a failure if there can be found no way to surmount an obstacle of that kind; our Government is worse than a failure if we can not in some way preserve the continuity and the regularity with which our basic operations are carried on.

The committee were deeply impressed with that feeling and we recognized that transportation is the basic industry of the Nation. It may not be more important from one aspect than many others, but none of the others can be conducted or carried on without transportation. Leave New York without transportation for two weeks and thousands of people will either starve or freeze, according to the season; indeed, they may do both. What I say of New York is true of Philadelphia, of Chicago, and of every great center of population.

Mr. THOMAS. It is true of Washington.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know but that it would be true of Washington. I suppose, however, there are some people who would feel that there were compensations if that calamity should fall upon Washington. [Laughter.]

We can not contemplate that situation with any complacency at all. If we can not find some way in which to avoid a contingency of that kind, then our boasted and vaunted institutions are mere shadows, and we should escape from them as speedily as possible. There must be some way in which a democracy can administer justice to all its citizens, which will render them so far content that they will be willing to carry on their vocations with reasonable regularity and continuity.

Mr. President, I was the author of a somewhat famous statement or declaration in what is known as the Clayton anti-trust law that the labor of a human being is neither a commodity nor an article of commerce. I believed in the truth of that statement profoundly then, and I believe in it now with even deeper conviction. The labor of a human being is not a commodity; it ought not to be dealt with as a commodity; it ought not to be judged as a commodity; for it is a part of human energy that may solicit and ought to receive the same high consideration from the world, from every legislative body, as all other energies of the mind or the body. But I am just as much opposed to Mr. Foster dealing with human labor as a commodity as I am opposed to Mr. Gary dealing with it as a commodity.

It is just as fatal to the welfare of the United States to allow the American Federation of Labor to deal with labor as a commodity or as an article of commerce as it is to allow the National Association of Manufacturers to deal with it as an article of commerce or as a commodity. This declaration, for which I make no apology and of which I am as proud as I am of any other act of my life, means that labor is to be lifted above the rules which apply to mere inanimate things; it means that the laborer is a man and entitled to all the rights of a man, and that he should no more sell himself to a labor union than he should sell himself to a manufacturer. It applies to both and all with equal force and strength.

I do not want it to be understood that I am opposed to labor unions. On the contrary, I think they are an essential part of our industrial organization. I do not believe that we could long survive in peace and in order without labor unions. I think the gathering together of men in every occupation is not only defensible but I think it is highly beneficial and helpful in the maintenance of law and order. The laboring men in any particular enterprise or in any particular calling have just as much right to come together and work to promote their own interests and lift themselves up, if they can, in the great scale of human society as have the men of capital or the men of the professions, the men who labor, as it is said, with their minds instead of with their hands. I do not want it to be understood that there is in this bill or that there is in my mind any antipathy, any hostility, anything but admiration, for labor unions.

I believe also in collective bargaining. There is no escape from collective bargaining. It is the decree of this age from which we ought not to attempt to escape. This bill is founded upon the necessity for labor unions, so far as the provisions to which I now have reference are concerned. It could not operate without the presence of labor unions. This bill recognizes collective bargaining; it can not be administered efficiently without collective bargaining.

I have said so much because there has been an industrious effort to misrepresent the bill. I have been amazed when I have read some of the lying reports which have been circulated throughout the country with respect to the objects which this bill seeks to attain, and I am saying what I have said to do what little I can do to overtake these gross and malicious misrepresentations.

It is said—it has been said to our committee—that this provision of the bill contravenes the natural rights of man, and is therefore unconstitutional. It is a very common thing to hear it said that this manacles the workingman, puts shackles upon his limbs, and reduces him to involuntary servitude. Nothing could be more wicked than an assertion of that character. This bill does not interfere with the right of any employee of a railroad company or any official of any railroad company, because this bill applies equally to every person who serves a common carrier if the common carrier is subject to the act to regulate commerce. The bill does not prevent, interfere with, or embarrass any man who desires to leave his employment. He can quit or a hundred of them or a thousand of them can quit whenever they desire so to do. But I am not willing to allow the statement to go unchallenged that it is a fundamental and a constitutional right that every man can enjoy to quit his employment whenever he pleases. That is not true.

This bill does not interfere with his right at all; but a soldier can not quit whenever he desires. He can not cease his employment. An engineer upon a railway train can not quit whenever he may desire to quit. He can not leave his engine and his train so that human life would be imperiled or so that property, even, might be injured. A physician or surgeon can not quit his employment whenever he may desire to quit, either morally or legally. He can not leave a dangerous operation half performed because it is his pleasure no longer to continue the work of his profession. I am mentioning these things simply to show that it is not true, broadly and fundamentally, that every man in the world can quit what he is doing at any moment he chooses to quit. The human right—and I am now speaking of the individual right rather than the group right—is subject to higher considerations than his pleasure.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope the Senator will not omit, in the category of obligations that he is now giving, to include men who are working under time contracts, whether collectively or individually.

Mr. CUMMINS. Quite true. That would not have occurred to me, but the observation is a very just one. I am mentioning these things not because they are material to the bill, for we do not attempt in the bill to interfere with the right of any employee of any railway company or any manager of any railway company to cease his employment whenever he individually may desire to do it, but I grow tired sometimes of hearing these broad generalizations which are so cheerfully made by those who want to relieve the human being of all responsibility to society. We owe something to our fellow men, and, as the President of the United States has just said, that is the dominant duty that falls upon every conscious, responsible human being.

It is well worth while to read what the President has just said upon this subject. I am not altogether sure that I understand his reference, but I think I do, and if anybody here differs from me in that respect I hope he will make it known at this time.

The President, in the message which was delivered day before yesterday to the Congress of the United States, said, among other things:

> Labor not only is entitled to an adequate wage, but capital should receive a reasonable return upon its investment and is entitled to protection at the hands of the Government in every emergency. No government worthy of the name can "play" these elements against each other, for there is a mutuality of interest between them which the Government must seek to express and to safeguard at all cost.

Truer words were never penned, a more timely warning to our industrial society was never given, than in the language I have just read.

But I proceed:

> The right of individuals to strike is inviolate and ought not to be interfered with by any process of government; but there is a predominant right, and that is the right of the Government to protect all of its people and to assert its power and majesty against the challenge of any class. The Government, when it asserts that right, seeks not to antagonize a class but simply to defend the right of the whole people as against the irreparable harm and injury that might be done by the attempt of any class to usurp a power that only Government itself has a right to exercise as a protection to all.

If I understand correctly the passage I have just read, it states views which every good citizen of the United States ought to entertain, and it expresses my own convictions with absolute accuracy.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The comment made by the Senator upon the message of the President is, I think, unquestionably correct. It is in harmony with the attitude of the President during the closing days of our session in September, 1916, when the Adamson bill was enacted. Prior to the enactment of that measure the President came before the Democratic steering committee of the Senate with a program of legislation which he declared to be fundamentally necessary, because of the impossibility of any agreement between the committees representing the railway companies and the heads of the brotherhoods over the issue which then became so acute. That program, among other things, provided for a bill containing the substance of that part of the railway bill which the Senator is now discussing relating to the subject of labor, and made substantially the same provision. It distinctly proposed to prevent strikes on a large scale as a result of disputes between the employees of the railroads and their managers until the submission of the dispute to a properly constituted tribunal; and the steering committee of the majority of the Senate at that time unanimously agreed to support it as a part of the recommendations of the President. That it did not do so is a matter of history; but I mention it now, in connection with the recital by the Senator from the President's recent message, not only as showing a consistency between his views then and his views now but also as showing that the committee is seeking in this matter to carry out what the steering committee of the Democratic Party unanimously agreed to carry out and accomplish in September, 1916.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it matters not to me whether the Democratic Party secures the credit for this legislation or not. To me it is absolutely a nonpartisan question.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator, I think, misunderstood me. I did not intend to suggest that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I know that.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to emphasize the fact that what the Senator is trying to do is what we ought to have done, and did not do. I quite agree that the question is too broad for any partisan consideration; and I hope that neither the Senator nor any other person present will gather the impression that I am trying to claim any credit either for the party to which I belong or for the President of the United States in connection with this matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to emphasize, and by that emphasis support, the position of the Senator, which seems to me to be in line with the duty resting upon the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator will not think, from the remark which I have just made, that any such thought was in my mind. It would be more difficult to convince me that the Senator from Colorado is moved now or at any time in great public matters by partisan considerations than it would to prove the same thing respecting almost any man in the world. I know the purity of his motives and I know that he did not intend by the reference he has just made even to indicate that this question—great, broad, comprehensive, vital, and fundamental—should take on a partisan coloring. I think, though, that the program suggested two or three years ago, and to which the Senator from Colorado has just referred, was not complete.

I may not remember it accurately, but it seems to me that the proposition then was that the strike should be prohibited for a time, pending an investigation with regard to the merits of the dispute, and that after the investigation was had, no matter what the outcome of the investigation might be, then the right to strike was resumed and might be exercised at any time. That has been tried in our sister Republic at the north. Canada has tried that plan, and I am bound to say that my examination of the history of the legislation and of its administration has not been reassuring.

This bill proposes to take away the right to strike at any time.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, if a right is inviolate, how can there be any predominant right?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not going to analyze the exact phraseology of the message from which I have read and subject it to any such critical analysis. I believe that the President meant, when he penned those words and sent the message to us, that the right to strike must be subordinate to the welfare of the great body of the people, and that when the strike involved the interests of all the people it must give way to some other plan for the adjustment of a dispute.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator will permit me, I would just like to say that I can not agree with the President's statement that the right to strike is inviolate. If that is true, the anti-strike clause in this bill is improper, and should be defeated.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I will leave the Senator from Montana to settle that with the President of the United States as best he can. He puts one construction upon the message, part of which I have read; I put another. I interpret it in the light of what I believe a statesman and a humanitarian would say under like circumstances, and I hope the Senator from Montana will not drive me from that very comfortable position.

Mr. MYERS. I have no desire to do that. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that I sought a settlement of that matter with the Senator from Iowa in preference to the President, because the Senator from Iowa approved the President's utterance, and the Senator from Iowa is present and the President is not here.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am bringing the President of the United States to the support of this bill, hoping that it will not only affect the people of Washington, and especially the Senate of the United States, but that it will affect the people of the whole country. We are dealing with a grave and impending crisis, and I can not, I will not, believe that the language which I have just read was intended to mean what the Senator from Montana insists that it means. I would rather think that it was in harmony with the suggestions of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I should be reluctant to place the construction on the message which has just been indicated by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. I am inclined to think that the views expressed by the Senator from Iowa are a correct interpretation of the message, which seems to be borne out by the action of the Attorney General in initiating proceedings against the striking miners, and from all that we can learn the action of the Attorney General has the support of the Chief Executive of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Utah. I agree with him in that respect. No matter what the proper interpretation of the President's message may be, the construction I have given it is sound policy for the people of the United States.

This bill punishes only a combination or agreement between railway employees, and when I use the word "employees" I mean all the employees of the corporation, whatever their rank may be. Even if I were to grant that the individual right to cease employment or quit is perfect and complete, I could not grant that the right to enter into a combination or conspiracy to accomplish a purpose inimical to the welfare of society is a natural or constitutional right. This bill does not control the individual, but it controls the combination, the agreement, and it declares that if two or more persons, being employees of a carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce, shall enter into an agreement or a combination to suspend or prevent the movement in interstate commerce of commodities on which we are all dependent for life and for health for the purpose of enforcing some demand or claim against their employer, that such persons shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished accordingly.

What right have I, who may believe I have a just claim against you, to enter into a conspiracy or combination or agreement with some other man or with some other men to deprive you of the necessaries of life until you yield to the demand which I have made upon you? It is monstrous. It can not be defended in any court of morals. A course of that kind can not be defended in any court of civilization and progress.

Mark you, I do not believe that the right of strike should be taken away from the employees without substituting something better in its stead. So long as it is a mere conflict between the employees and the employer, I would permit, of course, as this bill permits, a strike. The loss that might be imposed upon the employer does not greatly concern society, and there is no disposition on the part of the committee, I am sure, to interfere with a conflict of that character. It is only when the conflict, this endeavor to impose loss upon the employer, becomes destructive of society, of the welfare of the great body of the people, that this bill proposes to intervene and make it impossible.

I do not intend, Mr. President, to read the provisions, but I want to emphasize two things: First, the bill provides what it believes to be impartial tribunals for the adjudication of all disputes between the carriers and their employees. These tribunals, the details of which I shall not discuss at this moment, have jurisdiction of all the disputes which may come up from time to time between the railway corporations and their employees. Bear in mind that we have attempted to establish a tribunal with jurisdiction and with capacity to determine all the disputes which ever gave rise to a strike. In the second place, I hope you will bear in mind the character of the penal provision, which is that——

> It shall be unlawful for two or more persons, being officers, directors, managers, agents, attorneys, or employees of any carrier or carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, as amended, for the purpose of maintaining, adjusting, or settling any dispute, demand, or controversy which, under the provisions of this act, can be submitted for decision to the committee of wages and working conditions or to a regional board of adjustment, to enter into any combination or agreement with the intent substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation for the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce, or in pursuance of any such combination or agreement and with like purpose substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the operation of trains or other facilities of transportation for the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce.

This is the description of the offense; and remember that the offense can only be committed when the dispute is one of which the Government has taken jurisdiction, and which it has assumed the duty of adjudicating according to its very merits.

There is another provision which is necessary as a supplement to the one I have just read, as follows:

> Whoever knowingly and with like intent shall aid, abet, counsel, command, induce, or procure the commission or performance of any act made unlawful in the last preceding section hereof shall be held guilty of a misdemeanor—

And so forth.

You will all recognize that this is simply a reproduction of our present statute with regard to accessories and those who aid and abet in the commission of a crime.

Mr. President, remembering that we have provided a tribunal which we believe to be a just, fair, and impartial tribunal for the adjudication of all controversies of the character I have described, I hope that this thought will be in every mind, that we are substituting the justice of the Government of the United States for the justice which wage workers have hoped to secure through the strike. We are simply exchanging one instrumentality for another. We are offering an opportunity to secure justice which does not involve this awful sacrifice, which does not involve the wreck and ruin of industry, of homes, and of character. We are offering to do in controversies out of which railway strikes may arise just what our courts of justice have done for centuries with respect to controversies between man and man. Hitherto we have not regarded it as necessary that our Government should undertake the adjudication which is here provided for, and I, Mr. President, have been very slow and very reluctant to go forward to that duty. But I perceive, and I have long perceived, that it is necessary, if we are to have regularity and continuity of employment. Therefore I am willing, on the part of my Government, to undertake to do full and complete justice, so far as wages and working conditions are concerned, to those who enter into employment of this character. I believe, and believe from the bottom of my heart, that the laboring men of America will be more apt to secure justice or approach perfect justice through the intervention of these tribunals for the settlement of their disputes than they have ever been able to secure through the medium of the strike, when you remember the losses that are entailed not only upon the general public, not only upon their immediate employer, but upon themselves. When will the striking miners be able to recoup the enormous losses which they have suffered during the last month?

It is said they would, if necessary, imperil lives of their fellowmen in order to accomplish their purposes; but if we provide for them a tribunal in which they have confidence and for which they have respect and to which they can appeal, there could be no justification, no defense whatever, for the danger through which they are now leading the people of the United States. Think of this provision merely as a substitution of justice, so far as human government can administer justice, for the ends sought to be obtained by the strike.

I am not conscious of any change in my heart toward those who labor with their hands. I know through the experience of earlier years some of the hardships, some of the privations, some of the sufferings which attend the lives of men of meager compensation, but I can have no sympathy whatever with an effort to overturn the institutions of America through the disorders which must inevitably accompany these constantly repeated efforts to determine what is right and what is just by mere conflict and through the powers of endurance.

Possibly some Senator can suggest a better plan through which we may rise to a higher ground for the adjustment of these great disputes and for the calming of these intense passions. If any Senator can do so, I am sure the committee will be glad to accept any suggestion which may be made. We only know—and upon this I speak, I am sure, with absolute certainty—that in some way there must be found, in some way we must discover, the path from the tangle of conflict and of passion into which we are constantly led. I would have no faith in the intelligence of my fellow men, I would have no confidence in the patriotism of the people, if I did not believe that there is a solution for this mighty problem that will bring peace, order, prosperity, happiness, and content to all the people of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harris	Newberry	Stanley
Capper	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Thomas
Cummins	Kellogg	Page	Underwood
Curtis	Kenyon	Phipps	Wadsworth
Dial	Keyes	Reed	Warren
Fletcher	King	Sheppard	Watson
France	La Follette	Simmons
Gay	McKellar	Smoot
Hale	Myers	Spencer

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. EDGE, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. SWANSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. BALL entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-one Senators have answered the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. NUGENT and Mr. MCLEAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

After a little delay Mr. TOWNSEND and Mr. SMITH of Georgia entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I understand that there are Senators in the Capitol Building who refuse to obey the direction or order of the Sergeant at Arms. I think the Senate ought to be advised with regard to that matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Sergeant at Arms report the names of the Senators whom he has requested to attend?

Mr. CUMMINS. I very much desire to have an order entered. It is not fair that Senators who are in the building should make it impossible that the Senate shall make an order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the Sergeant at Arms is at the door of the Foreign Relations Committee trying to get in.

After some further delay Mr. MOSES, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. HITCHCOCK entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. STANLEY. I ask to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Boston Sunday Globe of November 30, 1919, by James Morgan, on the treaty of peace with Germany.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Boston Sunday Globe, Nov. 30.]

SHALL WE GO IT ALONE?—AND WHAT WOULD IT MEAN?—SOME OF THE THINGS THAT A FAILURE OF THE TREATY WOULD LET US IN FOR AND WHAT IT WOULD MEAN TO THE WORLD.

[By James Morgan.]

"Suppose the unsupposable—that the New York Stock Exchange, the Chicago Board of Trade, the New York Cotton Exchange, the Federal reserve bank, and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States should catch the habit of certain Senators and begin to talk of America going it alone. Every country for itself, and may the devil take the hindmost. We should worry! We can look out for ourselves!

"We are for America alone, first, last, and all the time. [Loud applause from the galleries.] We were born Americans; in spite of all temptation to belong to some other nation, we will live Americans and we will die Americans. [Uproarious cheers.] Let us get out of Europe—mind our own business and leave her to mind hers. She may go smash for all of us; we will not lift a finger to help her in reconstruction or in restoring her prosperity. We are not going to meddle in her affairs or let her meddle in ours, by jingo! [Deafening cheers.]

SAWING OFF THE LIMB.

"But what would happen to us? The rate of foreign exchange, which is already so much in our 'favor' that we are hastening to stop its becoming more 'favorable' to us, would sink so low that you would have to go down in a diving suit to find it. As it fell our own dollar would rise to such altitudes that we could not overtake it in an airplane.

"Next, the immense flood of our foreign trade would come rolling back upon us, putting out many of our factory fires and throwing out hundreds of thousands of our workers. The billions that Europe owes us she could not pay any more than a turnip can give blood, and credit would be paralyzed.

"After that, how much business of our own would there be left for us to mind? We should probably be kept busy for a day or two in locking up in asylums the crazy brokers and bankers and merchants who had sawed off the limb of the international tree on which we roosted.

IF DOCTORS TALKED LIKE SENATORS.

"Suppose another unsupposable—that the American Medical Association, the National Board of Health, the boards of health of New York, Boston, San Francisco, and of our other ports should catch the contagion of the Senate. Suppose the doctors became so intensely patriotic that they should refuse longer to correspond or cooperate with the health authorities of other nations in the war on infectious diseases, should declare by concurrent resolution that the war against pestilence is over, that henceforth the United States will take care of itself and leave the rest of the world to do the same.

"Extra! Extra! Yellow fever reappearing in Habana and in Rio de Janeiro! What business is that of ours? Why should we send our American doctors to clean up the filth of foreigners and destroy disease in those foreign countries, giving American lives to save Cubans or Brazilians? Wait until the yellow fever attacks us, as the dear old fathers of the Republic used to do, and then it will be time enough for us to fight it.

"Extra! Extra! The red plague, epidemic in Russia and threatening to sweep westward over Europe! That is no affair of ours, and will not be—until we ourselves catch it!

WHO IS MY NEIGHBOR?

"Does that sound far-fetched? Then what do you call the talk we have been getting from some of the Senators?

"The analogy is true. It is fresh in our memory how far off 'Spanish' influenza seemed to us when we first heard of it, and how indifferent we were. But in a few months it became 'American,' without our leave and without waiting to be naturalized.

"Political, financial, social, economic disorders are just as infectious as the influenza or the cholera, just as international in their sweep. Millions of lives, hundreds of billions of treasure might have been saved, the World War averted, if there had been any agency to supervise or clean up in time a little pesthole in the Balkans, where the germs of the great, desolating conflict were bred.

"We know now better than it was known in Judea the answer to a certain lawyer that asked Jesus, 'Who is my neighbor?' Whoever can give us a deadly fever is our neighbor, though he may dwell submerged in the unvisited slums of our city. And whoever can threaten our peace is our neighbor, though he be a crack-brained Serb 4,000 miles away in that little Bosnian town of Sarajevo, which most of us had never heard of until 1914. We had to learn that lesson by bitter experience, just as the people of Glasgow, in Thomas Carlyle's story, waited until an outcast woman had communicated her typhoid fever to 17 persons before they recognized that she was their sister and took care of her.

WHY WE WENT INTO THE WAR.

"We have so overstressed idealism and altruism as the motives of our foreign relations in the past three years that it has made many good people doubtful of the practical soundness of our policies and given devious politicians, camouflaged in the protective colors of the flag, a chance to spread among us the suspicion that we have been forgetting our own interests. The unvarnished truth is that our only idealism has been to hold up to the world old and tested American principles of action, asking nothing for ourselves that we are not willing to concede to everyone else.

"That is all the altruism there has been in our attitude toward Europe. It is simply enlightened egoism.

"There has been much prattling of it, but we all know that we did not go into the war to save Belgium, France, England, Europe. On the contrary, we let them blaze two years and a half while we dismissed it as none of our business.

"We did not go in even to avenge the loss of American lives off the Irish coast in 1915, but instead two-thirds of our Members of Congress, after the sinking of the Lusitania, were for ordering Americans to keep off the ships. Both of the big political parties held national conventions in June, 1916, when the war had been raging almost two years, and both declared for a continuance of the policy of neutrality.

"Most Americans began to find out that the war was our business only on a certain Sunday afternoon in October, 1916, when we saw it spread to Nantucket and German submarines drowning sailors off our coast. Still we waited till our ports actually were sealed with terror of the U-boats in February, 1917, and the Germans were plotting a flank attack upon us by way of Mexico. Then at last we went in to make the world safe for democracy, but only because democracy is our ocracy and autocracy was the other fellow's ocracy.

"Yet Senators tell us that we may be depended upon to spring to the rescue of civilization again when it is threatened as we sprang to its defense in this instance. But are we sure that civilization can wait the next time two years and a half for us to find out that a quarrel in Europe is any of our business and four years for us to arrive on the scene of danger?

ABRIDGING OUR SOVEREIGNTY.

"Some of the most fervent declaimers in the Senate against letting Europe 'dictate' our policies are just as fervent for our importing and adopting European militarism. Who but the Old World is dictating to us such a course? The plea and the pressure for conscription in this country in time of peace are a confession that the business and the broils of all the rest of the world are just as much our business and broils.

"Yet we must tack on a reservation to the clause in the treaty that looks toward universal disarmament, and decline to be bound generally because the treaty might, in even the remotest contingency, send a few regiments of our soldiers to preserve the peace of Europe. No; wait until there is no peace and then send overseas 2,000,000 troops to stop a war that others have started regardless of us.

"There must be no abridgement of our sovereignty! But it is abridged by every treaty we make, whether political or commercial.

"It is only a question of our voluntarily abridging our sovereignty, as we did 100 years ago in the Rush note for disarmament, even within our own territorial waters on the Great Lakes, and as we did half a dozen years ago in a score of arbitration treaties by which we are pledged without a single reservation to the same principle that this world treaty would pledge us to.

AN OSTRICH ISOLATION.

"We are in the world to stay, and not only since this war. We have always been in it. Even the American Indians found that they were, though walled in by thousands of miles of unexplored, uncharted seas. Our fathers in turn found that they were, when the war of the Spanish succession spread into their wilderness and lighted the torch that burned Old Deerfield.

"A century and a half before a Prussian monarch taught us the lesson anew our ancestors learned it from Frederick the Great, when, 'in order that he might rob a neighbor whom he had promised to defend, black men fought on the coast of Coromandel and red men scalped each other by the Great Lakes of North America.' Yet it is asked in this day by Senators of the United States what business it is of ours to send a handful of American soldiers to help establish a just peace in that very Silesia where the seven years' war started and whence it spread to Pittsburgh.

"To recoup his losses in that Old World war the British King taxed Americans, and thereby brought on the American Revolution, which a French King helped us to win because he wished to revenge the defeats of France on European battle fields. We were so much in the world in 1812 that we could not escape the flames of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars.

"The revolution of 1848 and a famine in misgoverned Ireland opened a torrent of German and Irish immigration to our shores. The burden of the Franco-Prussian War and of Prussian militarism still further swelled the flood of Teutonic migration to America. No sooner did a savage Czar begin the persecution of the Russian Jews than they began to swarn to our cities.

"An ostrich isolation is the only kind that is possible for us, ever was possible—to isolate our heads from the facts. This is what so many Senators have been doing and what we all did in the 40 years while the World War was preparing to steal upon us.

OUR LAST CHANCE.

"The only choice open to us is to live in the world with our peace subject wholly to the actions of other nations or to live in it on terms which we have had the leading part in making, which we almost dictated in this treaty. It is a fleeting opportunity, and it will not return, if ever, until we have been caught again in just such a collision of alliances as this war was—or something even worse.

"For if we kill this treaty, either openly or covertly, Europe can not restore it to life. She may not be able to save herself even from bankruptcy and revolution.

"We alone can save the treaty, can give it vitality. Without us the old armed alliances will become a necessity. Even now a thrill of terror is running through France, as she finds herself without an ally, facing across the width of a street a Germany still twice her size, and with a chance always of drawing Russia to her side. Without us, the peace of the world, civilization itself, must go swaying again on the old teeter board—the balance of power. And the nations once more in that snarl, it will be too late to attempt to unsnarl them and bring unity out of the clashing rivalries.

IF WE GO IT ALONE.

"All right, say the ultranationalistic, we can go it alone; we need no help from other nations. We will arm to the teeth and be prepared to take care of ourselves. But can we be sure that there may not be situations in which even we would be glad to have a friend? Surely, that came in handy enough in 1914–1918!

"Where will the next collision take place? No one knows. Possibly not where the British Navy and the French Army will be buffers for us again.

"The menace to us in the future may not come from Europe at all, but from Asia. We have seen what Japan could do in 30 years. How much more, if the world is to be abandoned to militarism, may not multitudinous China and India do in another 30, or 50, or 100 years? Those periods of time are only hours on the clock dial of history.

"It should give even the most self-reliant Americans pause when they reflect that, with Siberia detached from Russia, as it is now, the United States is the only Nation in the world to-day which fronts on the Orient and Occident. It is conceivable in the entanglements of alliances—Japan is even now renewing, reshaping, her alliance with England—that we might have to defend ourselves on both fronts at the same time.

"To be ready for battle at once on the Atlantic and the Pacific and to guard simultaneously the eastern and western coasts of the two Americas—all depending on us under the Monroe doctrine—would call for an American naval and military program which would make the Kaiser's preparedness and Prussian militarism look like pacifism. That unavoidable, actual burden should be weighed in the balance against the possible burdens of the treaty which Senators have been conjuring up.

"In any case, we are not in reality going to get along without the world. Why, then, not try to get along with it?"

RECESS.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, December 5, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 4, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WALSH.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, Thou hast permitted us to pass through the scourge of a world-wide war, attended with the loss of millions of lives, millions of wounded and scarred men, millions of heartaches, and billions of dollars, to teach us the beauty of peace and brotherly love, the pearl of great price.

Have we learned the lesson? God grant that we may have, that war may come no more.

When winds are raging o'er the upper ocean,
And billows wild contend with angry roar,
'Tis said, far down beneath the wild commotion,
That peaceful stillness reigneth evermore.

Far, far away the roar of passion dieth,
And loving thoughts rise calm and peacefully,
And no rude storm, how fierce soe'er it flieth,
Disturbs the soul that dwells, O Lord, in thee.

So to the heart that knows thy love, O Purest,
There is a temple, sacred evermore,
And all the babble of life's angry voices
Dies in hushed stillness at its peaceful door.

So may it be with Thy children. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SIX MONTHS' PAY TO DEPENDENTS OF REGULAR ARMY MEN.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is a vote now pending on the bill which was under consideration yesterday when the House adjourned?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question having been ordered, the vote will come on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to recommit; and that is the business now in order.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently no quorum is present.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, why not vote upon this motion to recommit, and save one roll call?

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, would not that be an automatic roll call?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a point of no quorum having been made, and the Chair having found that no quorum is present, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming moves a call of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. The House having divided yesterday on the motion to recommit, is not the vote now, under the point of order, on the motion to recommit?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In the first place, the House did not divide.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I beg to call the Chair's attention to the fact that the House did divide. The Speaker announced, "All in favor of this motion say 'aye,'" and the House was dividing when the point of no quorum was made. Regardless of what the RECORD shows, that is the fact. The House had divided.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The RECORD shows that the Speaker pro tempore stated:

The question is on the motion to recommit.

Thereupon Mr. BLANTON rose and said:

Mr. Speaker, on that motion to recommit I ask for the yeas and nays, and pending that I make the point of no quorum present.

The Chair would rule that under the circumstances the House was not dividing.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the RECORD be corrected to show the facts according to the reporter's notes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The RECORD does show the fact.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That request is not in order. The question now before the House is on the motion to order a call of the House.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ayres	Fairfield	Kahn	Sanders, N. Y.

Elston	Jones, Pa.	Sanders, Ind.
Esch	Jones, Tex.	Sanders, La.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this call 286 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Should the House be able to maintain the quorum which has lately answered to their names when called, then the only way by which the Members of the House can go on record "yea" or "nay" upon the motion to recommit would be for the House to order the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit, which would thus place every Member on record for or against the proposition. Is not that the fact?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If a sufficient number of the House——

Mr. BLANTON. Remain present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Express their desire for a call of the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLANTON. And that would be one-fifth of the Members present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes. The Chair lays before the House the unfinished business, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 2497. An act to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relative of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Eighteen Members have risen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that a call of the House has just been had and that 286 Members answered to their names. It is evident that 18 is not a sufficient number to secure a call of the roll on the motion to recommit. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 36, noes 191.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, on this vote I ask for the yeas and nays. I will not get them, but I ask for them just the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. Six gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number, and the bill is passed——

Mr. BLANTON. No, Mr. Speaker; we have not had the negative. We have had the affirmative vote, and I would like for the Chair to put the negative vote. The yeas and nays were called for, the affirmative vote was taken, but the negative had not been put.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those opposed will rise. On this vote the yeas are 201 and the nays are 11.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and fifty-one Members are present, a quorum, and the bill is passed.

On motion of Mr. GREENE of Vermont, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HULINGS. I desire to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a petition from many citizens of Pennsylvania respecting the railroad bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing in the RECORD a petition signed by citizens of Pennsylvania in respect to the railroad bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD two short resolutions, one of them by the post of the American Legion in Colorado and the other from the organization of Elks. They are patriotic in their nature, and I believe should be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD resolutions from the American Legion in Colorado and the Order of Elks. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Are these with reference to the present so-called industrial unrest?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. They are and caused by the activity of Socialists, Bolshevists, and the I. W. W.

Mr. BLANTON. Are they for or against Bolshevism? [Applause.]

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. The organizations from which they come should be a sufficient warrant to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. In most places of the country that would be true—in probably 97 out of 100 per cent of the cases—but I am sorry to say that even in the Army, and from a citizen holding a prominent position, hailing from the great State of Colorado, there have crept the principles of Bolshevism——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

NOMINATIONS FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the following motion to fill vacancies on committees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KITCHIN moves the election of the following-named gentlemen as members of the following committees:

HATTON W. SUMNERS, of Texas, Committee on the Judiciary.

PETER F. TAGUE, of Massachusetts, Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

LILIUS BRATTON RAINEY, of Alabama, Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

EDWARD COKE MANN, of South Carolina, Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions.

PHILIP HENRY STOLL, of South Carolina, Committee on War Claims and Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, a mistake was made in typewriting, and I wish to substitute the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, instead of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, for PETER F. TAGUE, of Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks to modify his motion by inserting the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds instead of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads as the committee to which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE] is nominated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

RE-REFERENCE.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent for the re-reference of a letter from the Secretary of War addressed to the Speaker of the House on November 19. This letter was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It relates to claims and credit accounts of certain Army officers. The House Committee on Military Affairs decided it had no jurisdiction. The Committee on Claims desires to exercise that jurisdiction and asks that it be re-referred to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent for a re-reference of a communication from the Secretary of War from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on Claims. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to renew my request for an extension of remarks by incorporating in the RECORD the resolutions I mentioned awhile ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing certain resolutions passed by the American Legion of Colorado and the Order of Elks of that State. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does not the gentleman know that practically every Member of the House has similar petitions presented to him?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. There have been no petitions similar to these presented, to my knowledge; otherwise I would not have presented them.

Mr. GARD. I am entirely in sympathy with what the gentleman wants to do, but the rules of the House provide for the filing of these petitions in an orderly and proper way. Now, to say that one Member may come in with two petitions, of which possibly every other Member has duplicate copies——

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Regular order is demanded. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MCKEOWN, for three days, on account of illness.

To Mr. KING (at the request of Mr. BROOKS of Illinois), for 20 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SUMNERS of Texas (at the request of Mr. RAYBURN), on account of sickness in his family.

WHEAT AND CORN MILL PRODUCTS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 408.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this rule the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 9755, being a bill to establish the standard of weights and measures for wheat and corn mill products. That there shall be two and one-half hours of general debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. VESTAL, and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. ASHBROOK. That at the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read for amendments under the five-minute rule, thereupon the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, if any have been agreed to, that the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the resolution is for the purpose of bringing before the House at this time for consideration the bill indicated, for standardizing the packages in which wheat and corn products are placed.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a question.

Mr. WINGO. This bill provides for standards of 5 and multiples of 5, or, rather, divisions of 100 pounds. Now, if this bill passes, those mills that have from time immemorial used the old standards of 8, 12, 24, 48, and 96, and the standard barrels of 196 pounds, will have to change their standards if their goods go through interstate commerce.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But the trouble is there is now no standard of 196 pounds.

Mr. WINGO. There is no standard by Federal statute, but there is the universal custom in most parts of the country.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In some of the States the standard is 196, and in other States it is 200, and the confusion has given rise to the necessity for this legislation. I understand the millers of the country, both those engaged in the production of flour and the production of corn products, are in favor of this bill.

Mr. WINGO. In other words, those who happen to be using the old standard in a great many of the States will have to conform to this new Federal standard. In other words, the Federal Government is going to tell them the size of container in which they will have to put up their flour.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman intend to bring in a bill standardizing clothes and the color of ties and socks, and all that sort of thing?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No. That is another matter; that will probably not be brought before the House.

Mr. WINGO. There will be proposed a standard for babies next.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. My understanding is that Congress is doing this for the purpose of establishing a standard throughout the land and that it does not apply to articles in interstate commerce.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to discuss the powers of Congress to deal with this question. There is no question about it. Congress is authorized to regulate standards of weights and measures throughout the country, and this resolution is for the purpose of giving the House the opportunity to do it now.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. It is the understanding of the gentleman that this bill is intended to have application to goods in intrastate as well as interstate commerce?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. That appears to be the understanding of the Bureau of Standards, and I think it would be under the provisions of the Constitution the gentleman refers to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think so.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. GARD. Is the bill H. R. 9755 a similar bill to the bill H. R. 4782, on which hearings were had?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am informed that it is the same bill.

Mr. GARD. The same bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am so informed.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is reported unanimously from the Committee on Rules, and it was represented to the Committee on Rules that the bill which it makes in order was a unanimous report of the committee. The purpose of the legislation seems to be very good, indeed, and there is undoubtedly a strong demand for it from the milling interests of the country.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. It has just been stated over here that this bill will regulate the packages in which flour and these products can be sold in intrastate commerce as well as interstate commerce.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; that is my understanding.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks Congress has the power to take away from the State the right to prescribe the packages that are sold within the State and which never go into interstate commerce?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes. The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress may fix standards of weights and measures.

Mr. STEVENSON. It may fix them in any kind of commerce or just in interstate commerce?

Mr. GARRETT. No; it has a general power.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. WINGO. There is quite a distinction between fixing the standards of weights and measures and fixing the standard sizes of packages. If you can do this, then we can fix the standard sizes of ladies' hats, can we not?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not care to go into the refinements of that. [Laughter.] The power is generally given under the Constitution to fix standards of weights and measures.

Mr. WINGO. Yes, of weights and measures; to fix standards of them, but not to apply them; not to tell how the standard shall be applied to containers. There is quite a distinction.

Mr. GARRETT. Whatever the situation may be—and I do not care to go into a discussion of the legislation—there is just one thing that I desire to call attention to, Mr. Speaker, and that is this——

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt before he goes into that?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CALDWELL. I wanted to ask the gentleman if there was pending before the Committee on Rules any request for a rule of more importance than this one?

Mr. GARRETT. Well, I do not know. This and one other were the only ones that were taken up for consideration—that is, for action—by the Committee on Rules this morning. It was stated that without this there would be no business to-day.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I wanted to ask why in section 1 a distinction was made between——

Mr. GARRETT. Is the gentleman asking me about the bill?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. I had nothing to do with the framing of the legislation, and probably could not give the gentleman a satisfactory answer. He might take it up with members of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

There is one thing that I wanted to say about this rule itself. This rule has been drawn upon the theory that the bill was properly upon the Union Calendar. As a matter of fact, I am inclined to believe that the bill really belongs to the House Calendar, and that if a point of order had been made at the proper time it would have gone to the House Calendar. But no point of order was made, and the Committee on Rules felt that to consider it in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was in many respects more satisfactory, inasmuch as the bill presents an easier method of amendment, and so reported the resolution upon the theory that it was correctly upon the Union Calendar. That is all, Mr. Speaker, that I care to say.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9755, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9755, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House having resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9755, the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9755) to establish a standard of weights and measures for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to make an announcement. The present occupant of the chair feels that it is one of the prime duties of a presiding officer to preserve order. This is due to gentlemen who address the committee and it is due also to Members desiring to listen to debate. So the present Chairman is trying rigidly to enforce the rule pertaining to order. [Applause.]

Mr. VESTAL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] is recognized for one-half of the time, one hour and a quarter.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I want to take just a few minutes of the time of the committee to explain the different provisions of this bill and try to show the desirability and the necessity of this bill being enacted into law. The object, the purpose, of the bill is to fix the standard of packages of wheat-mill and corn-mill products, naming them. The first section of the bill sets out the particular products that are to be affected by the legislation, namely, flours, hominy, grits, meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs. The second section fixes the standard weight of the packages when packed, shipped, sold, or offered for sale in packages of 5 pounds or more.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield in reference to a question as to the next section?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Why was a distinction made as to commercial feeding stuffs of 60, 70, and 80 pounds instead of 100 pounds? Why was not the same rule followed as to that?

Mr. VESTAL. I will come to that in a few moments. Section 3 provides the penalty for a person, firm, or corporation that packs or causes to be packed or ships or offers for shipment these products in any other size packages than those set out in section 2 of the bill.

Section 4 makes exemption of the standard packages when they are packed or intended for export, and packed according to specifications and directions of the foreign purchaser, and also provides how these are to be used and sold for domestic consumption if it becomes necessary to so sell them.

Section 5 provides that the Director of the Bureau of Standards shall make the rules and regulations necessary for the enforcement of the act.

Section 6 makes it the duty of the district attorney to cause proper proceedings to be instituted where violations occur.

Section 7 provides that the act shall not be construed as repealing certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizing the use of the metric system, and section 8 fixes the time when the act shall be put into effect.

The standard unit of the flour barrel is fixed by some States at 196 pounds, but by a system of subdivisions there are really established three standard-sized barrels, namely, of 192 pounds, 196 pounds, and 200 pounds.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Can the gentleman tell me whether 200 pounds of flour can be put into these 196-pound barrels easily enough?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes. I will get to that in a moment. Where some of the States have by law established a 196-pound barrel, or where they have established it by custom, they have failed to follow the subdivision for the one-half, one-quarter, one-eighth, and one-sixteenth, which would be, of course, 98 pounds for the half, 49 pounds for the quarter, 24½ pounds for the eighth, and 12¼ pounds for the sixteenth. While these States in general have established 98 pounds for the half barrel, we have States recognizing 49 pounds and 48 pounds for the quarter barrel and 24 pounds and 24½ pounds and 25 pounds for the eighth barrel, making, as I said a moment ago, really three standards—192, 196, and 200 pounds.

I might add here that a number of States have failed to adopt any standard for a flour barrel. Two or three years ago the Federal Trade Commission began an investigation of the matter from the standard of unfair competition, that it was impossible for millers in some States requiring a package of flour in 49-pound sacks to compete with States requiring or permitting 48-pound or 46-pound sacks in interstate commerce. A bill was introduced last session by the gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK], then chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, substantially like the one under consideration. But on account of other business the bill was not considered by the House.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman from Tennessee stated a moment ago that this bill came from your committee with a unanimous report.

Mr. VESTAL. That is correct.

Mr. LAZARO. Did the committee hold hearings?

Mr. VESTAL. We had extensive hearings.

Mr. LAZARO. Was there any opposition to it?

Mr. VESTAL. Absolutely none.

Mr. LAZARO. And the parties interested——

Mr. VESTAL. Were before the committee. Now, as I said a moment ago, a number of States, to be exact, 17 States of the Union, have no laws or statutes in relation to the standard of the flour package. One State in the Union, namely, Texas, is now on the 100-pound-weight basis for all of the commodities mentioned in this bill. The Texas Legislature has recently passed a bill substantially like the one under consideration. A number of States have a correct subdivision of the barrel as now used, making 98 pounds, 49 pounds, 24½ pounds, and 12¼ pounds for a half, quarter, eighth, and sixteenth barrel.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. How can the State enact a law if it is left to Congress altogether under the Constitution to enact laws?

Mr. VESTAL. I think the States have a right to enact a law, but if a Federal law is passed it will take precedence over any State law.

Mr. LANHAM. If the gentleman will pardon me, I hold in my hand the law passed by the State of Texas in reference to this matter, and it seems that the custom or policy is to adopt or enact a law only where Congress has failed to legislate.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. Section 3 provides that it shall be unlawful to ship flour for sale when in package form not in the standard size. Is it the intention to prevent the local miller or farmer from selling grain of any weight in a gunny sack or a bran sack, and would he be subject to the penalty of $500?

Mr. VESTAL. I do not quite catch what the gentleman means.

Mr. HAUGEN. If a country miller sells to a customer grain or feed or flour in a grain sack not of standard size, will he be liable for this penalty of $500? In other words, what is the definition of the words "when in package form"? I take it, that there are some definitions and perhaps the courts have passed on it.

Mr. VESTAL. I am not sure about that; but I will say to the gentleman that I propose to offer an amendment to section 3 that will absolutely clear that matter up.

Mr. HAUGEN. I think that is a dangerous proposition. In other words, "when in package form" ought to be absolutely defined.

Mr. VESTAL. The question was brought up by the Department of Agriculture, and I have an amendment to take care of that proposition.

As I was saying, some States have a correct subdivision and other States have an incorrect series of subdivisions, namely, 98 pounds, 48 pounds, 24 pounds, and 12 pounds for the one-half, one-fourth, one-eighth, and one-sixteenth barrels.

The State of Georgia, for instance, specifies 96 pounds gross weight for flours, grits, and corn meals, and the State of North Carolina specifies the 25-pound sack for the one-eighth of a barrel. Hence Georgia is on the basis of 192-pound barrel and North Carolina on a 200-pound basis.

Also, by investigation it is found that the standards fixed are not mandatory ones in all transactions. Illinois, for instance, fixed the barrel "whenever no special contract should be made to the contrary." Connecticut specifies what the barrel shall contain "when sold by weight." This same law applies to the States of Massachusetts, Wisconsin, and South Dakota.

We also find that some unusual units, such as 80 and 175 pound sacks for feed products in Alabama; 17½ and 8¾ pound sacks for corn-meal standards in Kansas and Oklahoma; and the 9$\frac{5}{16}$-pound sack allowed in Oregon.

I desire to insert in the RECORD as part of my remarks an abstract of the State laws fixing weights of standard barrels or sacks for flour, meals, and so forth, showing the subdivisions used, as I believe the same will be of interest to the Members of the House.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The way the situation now is any large milling concern doing business in quite a number of States would have to have packages of a certain size to ship into one State and a different sized package to go into another State; but if this proposition passes the whole matter will be standardized.

Mr. VESTAL. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the gentleman state when the bill goes into effect?

Mr. VESTAL. So far as flour is concerned, one year after its passage or approval, giving the millers an opportunity to get rid of these different sized sacks.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood the gentleman to say that before the committee which held extensive hearings on this subject no objection was offered to this bill.

Mr. VESTAL. That is correct.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does not the gentleman think there will be quite a lot of complaint upon the part of those who now have containers, which would not be standard containers when this bill passes, and who will have to get rid of them or lose them?

Mr. VESTAL. I hardly think so. I will say to the gentleman that the time given, one year from and after the passage of this act, will give millers ample opportunity, I think, to dispose of all of those odd-sized containers. They have a year after the bill is passed to get rid of these containers before this bill goes into effect.

Mr. TILLMAN. The value of these containers would be lessened greatly by the passage of this bill?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. So it would be a vast loss to those who own those containers, which will not be standard under this bill.

Mr. VESTAL. In the hearings we had representatives before the committee from the National Wheat Millers' Association, the White Corn Millers' Association, and practically all of the milling industries in the country, and they were very positive in their statement that if we would give them one year to dispose of these odd containers they would have ample time, and they were very anxious that the bill be passed as soon as possible.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman's statement relates largely to evils and abuses called to the attention of the committee, growing out of original packages as put up by the manufacturers. I am interested to know whether you had before the committee any representatives of business interests dealing in intrastate business? In other words, take the retail merchant, where he seeks to subdivide an original package into 12½ pound packages, did you have representatives of such interests before you?

Mr. VESTAL. No. I will say to the gentleman that no representative of that kind was before the committee, but the committee had hundreds of letters from men engaged in such business favoring this bill.

Mr. OLIVER. In favor of the bill?

Mr. VESTAL. In favor of the bill. I want to reiterate that in all the communications that I have received, or that the committee received, with reference to this bill there has never been a single communication but that was in favor of the immediate passage of the bill.

Mr. OLIVER. From the communications received by the committee was it apparent that very general notice had been given of the pendency of the bill?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes; that is true.

Mr. OLIVER. And your letters came from every section of the country?

Mr. VESTAL. From every section of the country.

Mr. OLIVER. And from every interest affected by the bill?

Mr. VESTAL. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman stated that quite a number of States have passed laws affecting this same subject?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Does this bill undertake to govern all the intrastate business of those several States?

Mr. VESTAL. Probably the bill as it is drawn will affect the intrastate shipments.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Has Congress the power to control intrastate business?

Mr. VESTAL. There is no question about that. That has been discussed here and decided on quite a number of bills similar to this.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. This law then will supersede all the State enactments?

Mr. VESTAL. That is correct.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the millers favor section 3?

Mr. VESTAL. As I said a moment ago, in all the communications that the committee have received there has not been a single one opposed to the bill.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Do you know that if this bill should be passed in its present form, providing for only 25, 50, and 100 pounds, every man who sold flour would be subject to fine and imprisonment?

Mr. VESTAL. No.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Do you know that flour put up in a package of 25 pounds dries out to a certain extent?

Mr. VESTAL. It is not necessary that the retailer put flour into 25-pound packages. It can be put into packages as small as 5 pounds.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. In packages which are any part of 200 pounds?

Mr. VESTAL. The decimal is 200 pounds.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. If a man puts flour into 25-pound bags and it does not state on the bag that it is 25 pounds when packed he is liable under this bill?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. How is the merchant going to prevent shrinkage?

Mr. VESTAL. I do not quite get the gentleman's question.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. In other words, flour weighs 200 pounds in a barrel when it is packed, but it will dry out 10 pounds by the time it gets to the consumer. How are you going to protect the man who sells the flour?

Mr. VESTAL. The Bureau of Standards, of course, will permit certain tolerances. There will be certain tolerances in these barrels.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. What is the use, then, of the law?

Mr. VESTAL. You must have certain tolerances in all these measures.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. At the present time a flour sack is marked. That is, the ordinary 12-pound sack has put on it "12 pounds when packed." Now, you are making it so that it has to be the exact weight, and it has to continue that weight until it is sold. I think it is one of the most ridiculous things I have ever seen.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I notice in this bill you stop at packages of 5 pounds. Did the committee take into consideration the question of packages of less than 5 pounds?

Mr. VESTAL. That was considered by the committee.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. There are a great many packages sold of 1 or 2 pounds?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. The people who buy them ought to be protected, because many are poor, especially in districts where there are a number of laborers.

Mr. VESTAL. That is a fact.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. They buy 1 or 2 pounds.

Mr. VESTAL. That is true.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. They are not protected. You are only taking care of the person who is rich enough to buy 5 pounds. Did you take that into consideration?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes; that was taken into consideration.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Why was it not adopted?

Mr. VESTAL. I will explain that to the gentleman, I think, to his satisfaction. The first bill provided for packages down to 1 pound, with an exemption clause covering the specialty products that were packed in containers, such as certain kinds of pancake flour and things of that kind that were specialties. Of course, the specialty manufacturers desired that in the bill. Some objection was made, and then the committee authorized the chairman of the committee to introduce this bill as a substitute to the other bill, making it apply only to packages of 5 pounds or more, which leaves out the specialty packages, which are all under 5 pounds. It is true that on the East Side in New York and on the West Side in Chicago packages of flour are sold in 3½-pound containers. A 7-pound package, as I get it from the investigation, is often sold, and then that is split into two 3½-pound packages and sold to the poor people; but the flour is usually weighed out to them, and I can not see where it would affect them at all.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Not only flour but poultry feed and a great many products from grain are sold in small packages. I notice that the testimony before the Committee on Agriculture developed instances where a great many packages were slight in weight, particularly those holding 2 or 3 ounces. It seems to me that if you are going to protect all of the American people, you should protect the poor as well as the rich.

Mr. VESTAL. Oh, I believe they would be protected.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. The gentleman has already made mention of the fact that there are at least three standards now in vogue. Was there not testimony introduced before the committee showing that certain dealers in flour could not be fairly dealt with in contracts for large amounts of flour for the reason that in some States 196 pounds were taken as a standard for a barrel and in other States 200 pounds, and, therefore, those who could deliver 196 pounds were in a position to bid much lower for a large amount of flour?

Mr. VESTAL. That is true.

Mr. ROSE. Will not this bill correct that evil?

Mr. VESTAL. It will. The Constitution of the United States wisely provides that Congress shall have the power to fix standard weights and measures for this country. The several States, or, as I have mentioned, a part of them, have defined by statutes, enacted in the exercise of their police power, varied and conflicting standards of weights and measures for cereals sold in bulk. As I have said, the purpose of this bill is to eliminate the present variations and conflicts in the State standards, whether fixed by statutes or custom, whereby a single and uniform standard of weights and measures for the products mentioned herein will be made effective throughout the United States. It is certain in my mind that the public will be greatly benefited by such Federal statute for the reason that the existing variation and conflict in standards recognized or permitted in the different States results in an increased cost of production, inasmuch as the millers necessarily have to carry a great and varied assortment of containers to meet the different standards and also in the inequitable treatment of the consumer. I had one letter from a milling concern in which it was said that the passage of this law would save that concern at least $100,000 a year in containers, because they had to carry such a different assortment of containers.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. In section 7 reference is made to the authorization of the metric standard in that in the standards as fixed they shall be as contained in this bill; yet the authorization of the use of the metric system has never been repealed. If the metric system is authorized and a man should sell flour under that system of measurement, would he be violating the law?

Mr. VESTAL. Oh, I think not.

Mr. DUNBAR. Would the gentleman digress to inform the committee if his committee expects to report a bill authorizing the adoption of the metric system for use in the United States?

Mr. VESTAL. I would say to my colleague that there will probably be a bill of that kind introduced and hearings will be had upon it before the committee.

Mr. DUNBAR. If that bill is introduced at this session and becomes a law it will supersede this act.

Mr. VESTAL. It will not affect this at all, because this is put on the decimal system anyway. This bill puts the sale of flour on the decimal system.

Mr. DUNBAR. But the metric system of weights and measures is entirely different from what we have to-day. If the metric system is adopted we will no longer have pounds or ounces or miles or such measures. All will be changed.

Mr. VESTAL. I think that is a bridge that we can cross when we come to it.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman who requested this legislation? Was there any general call for it? Where does it come from?

Mr. VESTAL. The National Millers' Association, the Corn Millers' Associations, and all of the different interests, the Grain Dealers' Association—men who are interested in the production of flour and corn meal and in the sale of the same.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. The idea is that those who make flour and ship it and handle it believe they could do so with greater convenience if the flour was put up in these packages or in these weights.

Mr. VESTAL. That is true, and also they will all be placed upon the same basis. That is, a milling concern in one State, where the standard is 196 pounds to the barrel, selling flour in another State, where the standard is 192 pounds to the barrel, would be placed on an equal basis with others. It would avoid that unfair competition. This proposes to standardize the weights in every State in the Nation so that they will all be on the same basis. I think there is no question but that if this bill is passed it will benefit the consumer for the reason that it is going to relieve the manufacturer of hundreds of thousands of dollars of cost that he has to carry now in overhead on account of the different kinds of containers that he has to keep. Take a miller, for instance, in Pennsylvania. He must keep different containers to sell to the people in Virginia and to the people in the other States surrounding Pennsylvania. If we have one standard they will all keep one size container.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I want to say to my colleague that the only letters that I have received in respect to this bill have been from dealers, and they are against the bill; that is, from manufacturers.

Mr. VESTAL. On this bill?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. These two manufacturers of flour have written protesting against the passage of this bill. But I want to say, and I am perfectly frank with my friend, that it looks to me, from the statement and from what I can find in this bill, that it is one which the flour manufacturers ought not to object to.

Mr. VESTAL. I think no manufacturer of flour should object to this bill if he wants to deal square in his sale of flour.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. It does seem on its face, so far as the retail trade is concerned, there is a chance of a good deal of juggling with the merchant if he has bags of flour in his store of different weights, because the ordinary man who buys it simply goes in and says, "Let me have a sack of flour," and does not stop to inquire how many pounds are in it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will this bill affect packages for export trade?

Mr. VESTAL. Not at all. I will now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. I want to ask the gentleman if there has been any recognition of the statement made by Mr. Clark, on page 53 of the second section, part 2, wherein he says:

It would seem that we are considering this bill from an entirely different standpoint from what was originally intended, which was to cover the product of wheat flour, in fact, in large sacks and barrels. Later it developed that the corn millers come in.

He said:

In my judgment you will have to abandon this bill and formulate an entirely new bill, because this bill was only formulated to cover wheat flour, and when you add to it you are going to make difficulties for yourself and everybody else, and you are not going to accomplish anything.

What about that statement?

Mr. VESTAL. I will explain that to the gentleman. As stated a moment ago, I believe the gentleman from Ohio asked if these hearings were upon the bill——

Mr. GARD. H. R. 7482.

Mr. VESTAL. That bill, if the gentleman has read it——

Mr. GARD. I have read it.

Mr. VESTAL. Instead of naming flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, simply says, "wheat flour and corn products for human food." It developed in the hearing that corn products for human food would also take in certain sirups made out of corn, and the corn-milling industry that is interested in the making of sirups said that if we pass this bill we would put them into unfair competition with other firms that manufacture sirup out of something else. It was not intended to cover things of that kind, and so, as a substitute to that bill and to get away from that provision of it, this bill was authorized to be introduced, naming the things that would come under this bill.

Mr. GARD. Of course, as to sirups, as the gentleman probably well knows, and probably better than I, the question of weights and measures would be within the prerogative of the committee; but I gather from the two bills that the committee has taken up the question of the measures of dry food.

Mr. VESTAL. That is correct.

Mr. GARD. And limiting it to that.

Mr. VESTAL. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question regarding the bill?

Mr. VESTAL. Certainly I will.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. If some retail dealer selling to the domestic trade desires a 9-pound package or a package a little smaller than some of the standard sizes designated in this bill, is not there a way under this bill by which he can get such odd-sized packages?

Mr. VESTAL. I think they can weigh out to retail dealers, certainly.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Could they not get such products in original nonstandard packages under this provision? Could not a miller or dealer pack under some standard of Germany or of France for contemplated foreign trade smaller-sized packages and later change his viewpoint and sell these odd-sized packages for American domestic trade?

Mr. VESTAL. Correct, under certain provisions.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. I will.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I notice in section 8 of the bill that as to wheat-flour products that it makes the bill take effect one year after the passage and approval of this act—and I might suggest a bill often becomes a law without approval—and it makes the bill take effect for corn products 90 days after the bill becomes a law. Are not a great many of these corn products packed by people who have to order containers a considerable period in advance under existing conditions?

Mr. VESTAL. I think that is true. I will say to the gentleman I think the reason that was fixed at 90 days is that the Food Administration, when the war broke out, compelled the corn millers to use this basis we have placed in this bill. The corn millers were very anxious to graduate from the Food Administration control to the new decimal principle since the war is over, and they have this as a standard, so they are really on this basis now.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This would not affect——

Mr. VESTAL. It would not. It would affect to some extent, I will say to the gentleman, some corn millers who, I think, had to go back and use different sized packages from those contemplated in this bill because of the competition. But as a general rule the corn millers are still using the decimal weight as mentioned in this bill, just as they were compelled to do by the Food Administration at the beginning of the war and all through the war.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know nothing about it personally except what experience I had in regard to the pure-food law. But frequently the producer of these articles has to order his packages quite a long time in advance.

Mr. VESTAL. That is true.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Now, if he has his packages, legal at present, he ought to be given a reasonable time in which those packages can be disposed of, and also be given a reasonable time in which to obtain new packages or a new standard.

Mr. VESTAL. That is absolutely true. I want to call the gentleman's attention to page 63 of part 3 of the hearings on that very subject.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Texas, a member of the committee, asked Mr. Husband this question. Mr. Husband is secretary of the National Millers' Association:

Is the time limit specified in section 8 of the proposed revision sufficient to enable the corn millers and others brought within this bill to adjust themselves to it without any inconvenience or expense, particularly to the people as well as to the mills?

Mr. HUSBAND. I am glad you asked that, because I had a letter from Mr. Genung, who was here last week and made a statement in favor of the bill, calling attention to the fact that the National Association of White Corn Millers, of which he is president, feels that they would not like to see those features of the bill which pertain to corn flours and corn meals, hominy, and grits effective at once, because they have been compelled, by reason of competition, to go back to the purchase again of the old-size sacks, the pound sacks and the nines, and the 13 pounds, and whatever the corn-mill packages were before that industry was put on the decimal basis by the Food Administration. They had hoped they might graduate from the Food Administration control to the new decimal principle by reason of this new legislation; but it has been a good while and they have since been compelled to go in and purchase sacks of the old style. Mr. Genung did not specify any time, but some of the others interested in that trade said they thought 90 days would be sufficient for them to work off those corn-products sacks.

Mr. OLIVER. The reasons for requiring a certain standard for the original packages put up by the miller or manufacturer, I think, are very wise and sound, but I am at a loss to understand why those reasons apply to the retail merchant when the established custom in his locality suggests that his customers demand packages different from what you herein provide, and as to which I understand you had information before your committee. Now, what wise public policy is subserved by stipulating what size package a local community shall buy these foodstuffs in from the retail merchants?

Mr. VESTAL. I will say to the gentleman—and I only know from my own experience—I go in and ask for a sack of flour, and I never think about the weight of the flour. Now, that sack may contain 24 pounds of flour; it may contain 24½ pounds of flour; it may contain 12 pounds of flour; and under this bill, if you go in and ask for a sack of flour, it must contain 25 pounds net, or it must contain 10 pounds net, or it must contain 5 pounds net. It seems to me that the consumer is the fellow who is going to benefit by this bill more than anybody else.

Mr. OLIVER. The consumer is protected by existing law against false weights. This bill primarily is intended to provide uniform weights for the original package. That certainly seems to be the main purpose the committee had in mind.

Mr. VESTAL. That is correct.

Mr. OLIVER. Now, in many localities the original package is subdivided for the retail trade, and the local demand largely determines what the subdivided packages shall be, and there are customs prevailing in some sections calling for 12½-pound packages and in others for an 8-pound package. Now, what public policy is to be subserved by forbidding a retail merchant from adapting his sales to a local custom found wise in these localities?

Mr. VESTAL. Suppose a retailer would buy a barrel of flour; he can sell that flour in any size package that he weighs it out in.

Mr. OLIVER. I question it under this bill as drawn. Now, I thought perhaps that the committee might be willing to so modify it as to at least provide that that can be done.

Mr. VESTAL. The committee, of course, is desirous of getting a bill that will benefit everybody.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VESTAL. Certainly.

Mr. HULINGS. I see here in section 7 that the act authorizing the use of the metric system is not repealed, but you forbid the use. Now, I would like to ask if your committee has ever considered, instead of this hodgepodge thing that has been going on all these years, the adoption of the metric system, which is the scientific, plain, easy system that could be understood in any part of the world? Every State now has the right to establish its own standard of weights and measures until it is ousted by action of Congress. Now, do you not think it would be a good time, instead of adding somewhat more to this hodgepodge, if the committee would go to work and consider the adoption of the metric system?

Mr. VESTAL. I would say to the gentleman there will probably be a bill introduced at this session of Congress on that very proposition.

Mr. HULINGS. If that is going to be introduced with any idea of its passing, is not this surplusage?

Mr. VESTAL. I hardly think so. Let us try and correct the present system. With this law upon the statute books the consumer who buys an eighth of a barrel of flour will receive 25 pounds net weight, whether he buys in the State of Maine or California, instead of 24½ pounds or 24 pounds that he now receives.

The manufacturer likewise in packing certain products for shipment knows that every other manufacturer of the same products must pack in the same sized container, containing the same number of pounds. Hence this bill, in my judgment, will benefit both the trade and the consumer.

Now, just one word about the different subdivisions used in the packing of commercial feeding stuffs. Some gentleman asked me that question a moment ago. I do not remember who it was.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, would it embarrass the gentleman to ask him a question right there?

Mr. VESTAL. Not at all.

Mr. GARD. From my reading of the bill I notice that it applies only to 5, 10, 25, and 50 pound packages, with the establishment of an additional standard of 100 pounds. Nothing under 5 pounds is considered in this bill. Is that correct?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes. Nothing under 5 pounds is considered in this bill.

Mr. GARD. Being interested, as I think we all are, from the standpoint of the consumer, does not the gentleman believe that nearly every consumer, especially those who buy in the large cities, indeed those who buy anywhere the so-called specialized products, are compelled to buy less than 5-pound packages?

Mr. VESTAL. This bill does not prohibit that.

Mr. GARD. It does not prohibit it specifically.

Mr. VESTAL. It does not affect the specialties at all.

Mr. GARD. I find here in the hearings references to Quaker Oats, and Aunt Jemima Pancake Flour, and Wheatena, and Postum Cereal Coffee, and various other cereal foods, the prices of which have recently been advanced in varying degrees, and they do not change the size of the package. Quaker Oats, for example, has been advanced from 25 to 30 per cent; Aunt Jemima from 25 to 35 per cent; Wheatena, 35 per cent. Postum Cereal has advanced, but they do not say how much. Now, as I remember it from the testimony of the representatives of these concerns, they have specially adapted machinery which provides for the packing and the cutting of the packages and the packing into receptacles. They do not want any change.

Mr. VESTAL. That is right.

Mr. GARD. Why is it not of advantage to the consuming public to have standard weights and measures for these cartons which are of such general use by the consumer?

Mr. VESTAL. I am frank to say to the gentleman from Ohio that I think it would be a good thing, but the committee felt that to take those specialties in under this bill would make it impossible to get the bill out and passed by the House. The committee felt that this bill was the starting point upon the proposition, and that if we wanted to take up these specialties later on they could be taken up under another bill.

Mr. GARD. I will say to the gentleman that if you do not get them under this bill you never will, because this is the favorable time for the enactment of such legislation as this. When other important matters come up later there will hardly be any prospect of taking it up again.

Mr. VESTAL. The committee was satisfied after the hearings that really as to the specialty products packed in these special sized packages or cartons it was to the advantage of the consumer not to bother with them. For instance, merchants sell certain kinds of breakfast foods in 8-ounce packages. They sell those in carloads to the Army. They sell them in a certain sized package which is supposed to be sufficient to feed one soldier, and they claim that if that were put into a larger sized package the contents would deteriorate.

Mr. GARD. The hearings developed the fact that one man said packages of corn products sell in 8-ounce cartons and 13 ounces and another of 55 ounces and 20 ounces. Why is it not a good plan to have this regulated by the enactment of a law of the United States? The matter of the consumption of oats and corn products is something which applies to every one of us on the breakfast table every morning. Nearly everybody eats a cereal product.

Mr. VESTAL. That is true.

Mr. GARD. And it is of more immediate consequence to the consumer to have a standard of the thing he uses than to have a standard of the more bulky articles. Does not the gentleman agree with me on that?

Mr. VESTAL. I do not know. The committee, I think, was satisfied, after the hearings, that the public demanded, so far as these special products are concerned, certain sized packages; that is, it would be shown by the sales that the packages which the factories had been putting out for years were about the sizes that were suitable to the consumer, and therefore to change that and to make a different sized package and to compel them to pack in a larger size package might result in the contents deteriorating, and it would cost hundreds and thousands of dollars to change the machinery to make these specialty packages, and it would probably result in a greater cost to the consumer of these different products.

Mr. GARD. The thing that the public suffers from, in my observation, is the desire—if one may use that word correctly; the practice probably is the better word—of persons who sell to the ultimate final consumer of giving short measure and short weight. That is an evil that is recognized all over the country, and people are easily taken in by it, because hardly anyone stops to investigate either the measure or the weight. They must rely upon the standard. Now, if we can rely upon a standard, why is it not the best plan to have the standard apply to the things that are of the most immediate and constant use?

Mr. VESTAL. Of course, these packages must all bear on the outside the net weight. That is compelled under the pure food and drugs act.

Mr. GARD. I understand that. Another question let me ask under section 3. The gentleman is familiar with the bill, and I ask the question for information. Under section 3 is it possible for me to go into a grocery store in my town and buy 4 pounds of flour and have it put into a sack and take it home?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARD. I notice from the reading here that it says that it will be "unlawful for any person to sell or offer for sale wheat-mill and corn-mill products, flour," and so forth, which in package form shall not be one of the standard sizes, and so forth.

Mr. VESTAL. That, of course, refers to it in package form.

Mr. GARD. What is meant by "package form"? Does it mean some regular pasteboard container, or a sack or bag such as flour is commonly sold in?

Mr. VESTAL. I do not know whether I am competent to say what that term "package" means.

Mr. GARD. It strikes me that it is a material element, because if it is the intention of this bill to prescribe to the manufacturer or seller the size of the package he manufactures or sells, some steps should be taken to prevent the sale of 3 pounds of flour for 4 pounds to a poor person. That is not provided in the bill.

Mr. VESTAL. Oh, no; but the bill provides that this shall not have any effect except as to packages of over 5 pounds.

Mr. GARD. Yes, in packages.

Mr. VESTAL. They must be over 5 pounds. Now, you can sell 3½ pounds or 1 pound or 2 pounds or 4½ pounds.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Without any restraint?

Mr. VESTAL. Without any restraint.

Mr. GARD. How about 7 pounds?

Mr. VESTAL. I am of the opinion that they might sell 6 or 7 pounds by weight, unless it is in package form, put up in packages.

Mr. GARD. I know personally that some of the Minnesota millers have packages of flour in 6-pound packages—I think the Ward & Crosby people.

Mr. VESTAL. Yes; that is true.

Mr. GARD. Six-pound packages.

Mr. VESTAL. Those will be eliminated.

Mr. GARD. There will be no more 6-pound packages?

Mr. VESTAL. No more 6-pound packages.

Mr. GARD. They will have to be 5 or 10 pounds?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes; if they are put up in packages or containers.

Mr. GARD. Suppose I am a retail merchant, and suppose I buy a barrel of flour and a man from my neighborhood wants to buy 6 or 7 pounds of flour. Can I sell him that out of the barrel?

Mr. VESTAL. I should think so, without any question.

Mr. GARD. And the third section, you think, would not apply to me?

Mr. VESTAL. I do not think it would.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have looked the bill through and I can not find anything in it to justify that opinion. What does the gentleman base that opinion on?

Mr. VESTAL. Section 3 provides:

That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association to pack, or cause to be packed, to ship or offer for shipment, or to sell or offer for sale, the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, which, when in package form, shall not be one of the standard sizes established in section 2 hereof and bear a plain, legible, and conspicuous statement of the net weight contained therein.

Mr. ANDERSON. A man can not carry away 5 pounds or 50 pounds of flour or mill feed in his coat pocket.

Mr. VESTAL. I understand that; but the package meant here is where the package is put up and labeled "5 pounds." He can not put up a package and label it and sell it for 6, 7, or 8 pounds. If you go in and buy 8 or 9 pounds of flour from a barrel, it can be put in a container and carried away.

Mr. ANDERSON. Then let me ask the gentleman this question: Suppose a farmer goes to a mill and takes his sacks there, as farmers ordinarily do, and he buys 600 pounds of mill feed and they put it up in sacks. Some of them weigh 93 pounds, some 97 pounds, some 84 pounds. Now, under a strict interpretation of this act, sales in that form would be in violation of the law.

Mr. VESTAL. I do not think that is the correct interpretation. Yet this bill is designed to protect the farmer who takes his grain to the mill and in return gets commercial feedstuff, bran, or shorts. My little experience in taking wheat to the mill and getting commercial feedstuffs is that you can not put a hundred pounds of bran in a sack, and so we reduced the weight to 60, 70, and 80 pounds, so as to protect the consumer and see to it that the sack will hold his 80 pounds; that he gets 80 pounds in that sack. If we had left it 100 pounds, they might give him a sack supposed to contain 100 pounds, but which would not contain 100 pounds and only contain 80 pounds. That was the idea, at least.

Mr. ANDERSON. If it happened to contain 83 pounds, it would be sold in violation of this law.

Mr. VESTAL. He would get that much more.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think so. I think it would be a violation of the law.

Mr. VESTAL. I am sure it would not be a violation of law.

Mr. DUNBAR. In section 2, to which section 3 refers, the expression "standard package" is used. Now, a barrel of flour is to be of the standard weight of 200 pounds. In selling flour in package form these weights which are prescribed are intended to mean in half-barrel, quarter-barrel, and eighth-barrel lots. That is the standard package; but I do not take it that any man would be prohibited from offering for sale flour not in standard packages in any amount that the customer might wish to purchase.

Mr. VESTAL. I do not think so. Now, just one clause more about the different subdivisions.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. In just a moment. In the subdivisions used in packing the commercial feedstuffs, as was mentioned by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], 60, 70, and 80 pounds are set out so as to take care of the cases where a farmer uses his own sacks in taking the wheat to the mill and buying feeding stuffs. Probably it would be impossible to put 100 pounds of feeding stuff in a 100-pound sack. So the lesser weight was provided for sacks containing commercial feeding stuffs.

Mr. WELLING. Would it mean that a farmer who took 20 burlap sacks to the mill in which to get feed would have to get 60, 70, or 80 pounds in each sack? Suppose a sack would hold 90 pounds or 100 pounds?

Mr. VESTAL. There would not be any reason why he would not buy that; but if the miller was selling the container, the standard must be 100 pounds, but on account of feeding stuffs being lighter in weight the 60, 70, or 80 pound containers are authorized. That is, he could not put out commercial feedstuff in a 100-pound sack when the sack did not contain that much and could not contain that much, and this bill makes it lawful to use 60, 70, and 80 pound containers.

Mr. WELLING. Is it not a fact, known to every man who has had any experience on the farm, that no two sacks will hold the same amount?

Mr. VESTAL. That is correct.

Mr. WELLING. The farmer will go to mill with 25 sacks, and no two of them, if they are filled to their capacity, will weigh the same.

Mr. VESTAL. That is correct.

Mr. WELLING. Now, are you going to compel the miller who sells that feed to use a sack which shall contain exactly 60, 70, or 80 pounds and stop there?

Mr. VESTAL. We are going to compel the miller, if he sells a sack containing 80 pounds, to see that the sack contains 80 pounds.

Mr. WELLING. Suppose the sack contains 95 pounds?

Mr. VESTAL. I do not think there is any reason in this bill why you can not put 95 pounds in a sack and buy it by weight; but if the miller is selling standard packages the standard package must contain 60, 70, 80, or 100 pounds. If it contained more, there would be no objection to it, but it must contain that.

Mr. WELLING. Then, if I go to the mill, I can get a ton of feed in any number of sacks I want to get it in.

Mr. VESTAL. I should think so.

This bill has the indorsement of the Millers' National Federation, American Corn Millers' Federation, National Association of White Corn Millers, the State sealers of Minnesota and of Wisconsin, the National Grain Dealers' Association, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, the Bureau of Standards, and hundreds of independent millers from every State in the Union.

In my judgment, it is a very important piece of legislation and should be enacted into law.

I might say here that after the bill was introduced in its present form the Secretary of Agriculture called my attention to section 3 in the bill, and said that probably in its present form it would be a conflict of authority, as the pure food and drugs act is under the control of the Department of Agriculture. This bill provides for the Bureau of Standards having control.

I expect to offer, when the bill is read for amendment, an amendment to section 3 striking out, in line 20, beginning with the word "hereof," the balance of the line, and line 21 and line 22, down to and including the word "therein." The Bureau of Standards believes that the local State laws will take care of any intrastate shipments, and under the pure food and drugs act the interstate shipments will be taken care of.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. GARD. This only applies to packages marked on the back with the net weight. Now, on the question of weight I desire to ask the gentleman this question: Can the gentleman advise me the difference in weight in an 80-pound package, where it is manufactured and weighed and labelel 80 pounds, and what the weight will be, say, 60 days thereafter?

Mr. VESTAL. I can not state.

Mr. GARD. Is there any difference?

Mr. VESTAL. There probably would be a difference.

Mr. GARD. It would be lighter by the drying-out process, would it not?

Mr. VESTAL. Probably so.

Mr. GARD. Nevertheless, it would be sold by the old weight when it left the factory. It would sell for 80 pounds, although it does not weigh 80 pounds, because it weighed 80 pounds at the time it was put up.

Mr. VESTAL. I do not know how that could be remedied.

Mr. GARD. It could be remedied by having the actual weight at the time of the sale. Under this bill he can sell something for 80 pounds of commercial feed which, in fact, at the time of the sale might not weigh more than 75 pounds.

Mr. VESTAL. I do not know, but I should not think there would be that shrinkage.

Mr. GARD. It might be 4 or 5 pounds in an 80-pound sack, might it not?

Mr. VESTAL. It may be, but I should hardly think so. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed one hour and seven minutes.

Mr. VESTAL. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will yield to me, I want to say that I am in harmony with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] in regard to marking small packages, and it is my purpose to introduce an amendment to that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] for 1 hour and 15 minutes.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures for the past hour or more has been endeavoring as best he could—and I may say has succeeded well—in explaining this bill. It is not my desire or intention to take more than a moment of time. I want to say that for a number of years there has been considerable clamor for this legislation. I might say in all frankness and sincerity that I believe the desire for the passage of the bill comes chiefly from the millers and the manufacturers. I am, however, of the opinion that the people of the country at large are as well advised as to this bill as they are of the general run of legislation.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Is there anything in this bill to which the consuming public could object? In other words, is there anything concealed therein that is liable to be of a disadvantage to the purchasing public?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will say to my friend that I was about to remark that so far as I have been able to pass upon the bill—and I have given the matter some consideration, not so much as some other members of the committee during the past session, but I have for several years given this legislation some consideration, and it is my honest and humble opinion that there is nothing in the bill that is not in the best interests of the consuming public or the people at large.

I think the standardization of weights and measures is desirable, not only for the sale of food products as included in this bill but also in a general way. I believe that all the States should have the same weights and containers for food products and other commodities, so that if you live in Ohio and you buy in Massachusetts or Connecticut you know that you are getting the same weight that prevails in your own State and that there is no loss by buying in other States.

I was about to say that this committee has had extensive and exhaustive hearings on this bill. It is true that those who appeared before the committee were largely those interested in the manufacture of these products, and so far as I know none of those who represent the consuming public at large appeared before the committee; but, as has been stated by the chairman of the committee, I have never heard of a single protest against this bill or against this legislation.

This bill for several years past has been well advertised in the papers and magazines of the country, so that the public has had advance notice that this legislation was pending. If it was not in the interest of the consuming public it would seem a strange condition of affairs that some member of the committee or some Member of the House should not have received protests against the bill.

So far as I am able to state, I know of no objection upon the part of anyone to the bill. In my judgment, it is good legislation. That was the judgment of the committee. It is a unanimous report of the committee, and I believe the bill should pass.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman is a prominent member of the committee. Can he tell me by whom the bill was prepared?

Mr. ASHBROOK. The gentleman asks me, and I am not going to give him an evasive answer, but will tell him the truth. I believe it was prepared by a Mr. Husband, who is the head of the Millers' Association of the United States.

Mr. GARD. I note that on page 62 of the hearings, Mr. ASHBROOK is quoted as saying this:

> And in this particular case I think it is right and proper that those gentlemen who have the best knowledge of the matter and have the matter in hand should prepare the bill.

It was in that connection that I asked the gentleman who did prepare the bill. The gentleman says that a representative of the milling interests prepared it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. If I am not mistaken that statement which the gentleman reads from the hearings, made by myself, grew out of the fact that the bill as it was first introduced included breakfast foods and small-package cereal foods. Serious objection was raised to their being included in this bill.

Mr. WELLING. Who objected to their being included?

Mr. ASHBROOK. All of the manufacturers of breakfast-food products.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. In connection with the suggestion that the bill may have been prepared by certain gentlemen, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if it is not true that this bill, almost identical in form, has already been passed by several States in the Union, at least in the State of Texas, and is now a law on the statute books of those States?

Mr. ASHBROOK. That is my understanding, and I would further state to the committee that one thing that influenced me in favor of the bill was not so much the fact that the Millers' Association was demanding it, but the Bureau of Standards has been an ardent advocate of the passage of this bill, and I feel that we ought to give some consideration to that branch of our Government.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The gentleman has mentioned the fact, and so also did the chairman of the committee, that there were no protests against the bill. I wish to say that I have received some from certain milling interests in Minnesota, most of which stated certain objections to it in a sort of propaganda form—at least, they were very similar—and the impression seemed to be that this was an attempt on the part of Congress to regulate packages through interstate commerce. When it was explained to them that Congress was exercising its power under the Constitution to establish a standard, and that this would wipe out the present 48 standards in the different States, a great many of the objectors withdrew their objections, although that is not universally true.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I thank the gentleman for his statement, and I would inquire of him whether or not he filed any of those protests with the committee?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I did not. I sent them the hearings and endeavored to get them to particularize their objections, and in doing so found out what the principal objection seemed to be.

Mr. ASHBROOK. My understanding is that the big milling interests in the gentleman's State are very much in favor of this legislation.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Very much so. That is true in my own city of Minneapolis.

Mr. BEGG. If this bill becomes a law, can a man who has a barrel of flour in his store sell 7 pounds of it to a customer without becoming a technical violator of the law?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will give the gentleman my own understanding of the bill. I may be wrong, and I would not want to say that I am right, but my understanding of this bill is that if a dealer has a barrel of flour and he takes out of that barrel a certain amount and weighs out a certain number of pounds, he can do so and not violate the law; but if a miller or a manufacturer puts out flour or feedstuffs in containers, then those containers must conform to this bill.

Mr. BEGG. I would say to the gentleman that I did not so understand the bill. In other words, I did not see anything in the bill that gives that latitude and it seems to me that latitude ought to be given.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I do not see anything in the bill which does not give that latitude.

Mr. BEGG. I can cite the gentleman to the subject matter where it says that anyone who sells in any other quantity than 5 or 10 or any other multiple of a hundred——

Mr. ASHBROOK. Oh, that the standard packages shall be so and so. That is, if a man puts out a bag or a sack or a container of any kind, it must conform to this bill and be in 5, 10, 25, 50, and so-and-so pounds; but if a man breaks a container and he wants to sell to some poor person an odd number of pounds of flour in an ordinary package, if I understand the bill correctly, he has the right to do so.

Mr. BEGG. May I just read to the gentleman a portion of section 3?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Yes; and, if I am not mistaken, the chairman of the committee, who has occupied an hour of time in explaining the bill, is of the same opinion.

Mr. BEGG. The lines to which I would direct the gentleman's attention are these:

> That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association to pack—

And that is what the gentleman stated—> or cause to be packed, to ship or offer for shipment, or to sell or offer for sale—

That is in line with what the gentleman says—

> the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products—

And so forth. And it goes on then to name them, in any other than the standard sizes——

Mr. ASHBROOK (reading)— > when in package form.

"In package form" is a package that is put out by a miller is the way I understand it.

Mr. BEGG. I may be wrong, but it struck me that a man could not sell at retail.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I think we should have a definition of what "in package form" really means.

Mr. ASHBROOK. It seems to me that that is plain enough.

Mr. HAUGEN. My understanding is that the courts have defined "package form," but I have been unable to find the court decision.

Mr. ASHBROOK. When the millers ship any of these products they must be in packages to conform to this law.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have in mind a country miller. Say that a farmer goes there with his grain and calls for so much flour, and suppose 78 pounds of flour are ground and put up in a grain sack. The penalty under the circumstances is $500, and it seems to me that that is an injustice. I take it that no one cares to penalize anyone for selling any other packages than those named in the bill unless they are sold with some intent to defraud.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Well, I might be far from the facts in my judgment, but my belief is that if the farmer goes to the miller with his grain to have it ground and he receives in return a certain number of pounds of flour and other feeds that go with the wheat it is not a violation for him to receive the odd weight; but if the miller sells him a sack of flour, if he puts up a sack of flour to send it out under his brand, then it must conform to the law.

Mr. HAUGEN. I agree with the gentleman, but the bill reads unless it is in 5 pounds, 25 pounds, or 50 pounds it is not in package form, and the penalty is $500. It seems to me there should be some definition of package form, and it should be made clear that the miller may sell in any package he might see fit providing he gives the net weight.

Mr. ASHBROOK. As a matter of fact, is that a sale when the farmer takes his wheat to the miller and gets it ground and receives in return a certain number of pounds? That is not a sale.

Mr. HAUGEN. In years past it was customary for the farmer to haul the wheat to the mill and have it ground and the miller to take the toll. Now the farmer sells the wheat and goes to the mill and buys the flour and buys it in his own container. It may be a grain sack or a flour sack.

Mr. ASHBROOK. If he buys outright from the miller the miller must sell it in compliance with this bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. Suppose he has not a standard sack? They use a grain sack or any other sack.

Mr. ASHBROOK. But he has scales in his mill and he can weigh it out.

Mr. HAUGEN. But he must have this standard container.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I do not so understand it.

Mr. HAUGEN. According to the bill.

Mr. ASHBROOK. It is the container which contains a number of pounds mentioned in this bill.

Mr. DUNBAR. The package form is referred to in section 2, and in section 2 the meaning of package form is the standard package. Now, the standard weights of packages are to be 5, 10, 25, and 50 pounds, or 200 or decimals of 200, so that while you can not sell a standard package in package form containing any other multiples or decimals of 200, yet you can sell in bulk any amount which you want, because when you are selling in bulk you are not selling in standard packages in package form and you are not setting up a standard package in package form.

Mr. HAUGEN. If the law is to be so considered I have no objection, and I certainly agree with the gentleman that we ought to pass it. However, I think that nobody desires to penalize anybody for selling in any other container than that provided for here.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, this discussion of this bill is no doubt very interesting and proper, but when the bill comes up for consideration under the five-minute rule these gentlemen may then have opportunity to express themselves for or against the bill. I promised to yield some time to the Members on this side of the House, and I therefore will be compelled at this time to end this discussion of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] has 52 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] has 9.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have requested the courtesy of consuming the time I have asked for the purpose of directing the attention of the House and the country to the present status of the numerous bills that have been introduced in the special session of Congress affecting the interest of our discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines.

I do not know, as a matter of fact, that when the armistice was signed and the soldiers were mustered out of the service and returned to their homes that those who were not wounded and not disabled expected the Congress of the United States to initiate any legislation of any character for their special and particular benefit, but I do know, and you know, whether the propaganda was incited by the ex-service men themselves or not—and in a large measure it was not—that there have been introduced in this Congress by various Members from various sections some 50 or 60 bills relating exclusively to this particular subject which I am discussing.

Now, early in the special session, upon the recommendation of the President in a special message, and evidently by the assent of the majority leader, what is known as the Lane bill or the Mondell bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and after extensive hearings that bill was favorably reported, and has been upon the calendar of the House awaiting action since the 1st day of August last. That bill provides for the reclamation of arid, cut-over, and swamp lands by ex-soldiers. There have been introduced into Congress many bills to provide for bonuses and extra compensation, bills to provide financial assistance to the ex-service men for the purpose of buying either rural or town and city homes, and the combination of all these elements of relief measures have been referred to the various appropriate committees of the House.

Now, gentlemen, what is the net result up to this date? The Mondell bill, as I say, lies dormant, if not dead, upon the calendar. I heard a distinguished Member of the Senate, high in authority in that body, a Republican, say casually in the Senate restaurant, when the President's message came in in connection with the renewed recommendation for the passage of the Mondell bill, that it was idle for the President to make any recommendation in regard to that bill, for it was as dead as a red herring. It seems to be so as far as any action here in this House or any effort of the majority to put it upon its passage is concerned. And bear in mind that is the only bill ready for passage framed in the interest of the ex-service men.

I do not know, in the long run, whether this Congress is going to pass any affirmative legislation for the benefit of the service men or not, but I do say, in justice to them, that this Congress ought to exercise its power and its responsibility either to pass some legislation of that character or to announce to them and the country that it proposes not to pass it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, I have introduced upon my own authority and without consultation with anybody a resolution which has been referred to the Committee on Rules—House resolution No. 405—proposing that the Speaker of the House shall appoint a special committee of 18 Members, to which committee shall be referred all of these various and sundry bills affecting measures of this character, namely, those providing for rural homes, those providing capital for agricultural development, and those providing bonuses or additional compensation, in order that, if this Congress is going to take any action of any sort, a special committee of that character, appointed in the discretion of the Speaker, shall have an opportunity to consider every phase and angle of the situation in order to bring out legislation that will meet the various contending positions on this question, because no single bill will do it. You take a man that was a soldier, and if legislation is passed providing for rural homes that does not interest him if he is a city man and is not interested in a farm. The Mondell bill, if passed, would only serve to interest a small per cent of the ex-soldiers, because only a few would desire to go off to some strange section to reclaim swamp or cut-over lands for farms, although some would do so.

Many of the men would be glad to waive any claim for further bonus if they could be given an opportunity to borrow money through Government agencies, on reasonable terms, to buy and own their own homes and farms, as is provided in several of the bills which have been introduced, but which seem to be chloroformed in the committees.

The purpose of my resolution—and I urge upon gentlemen the thoughtful consideration of the proposal—is to afford an opportunity for legislation to be brought out, just as opportunity was afforded for the bringing out of water-power legislation by the creation of the special Water Power Committee. It would give opportunity to harmonize all these various schools of thought on special legislation for ex-soldiers, placing all these bills in the hands of one central committee, upon which shall rest the duty and responsibility of finally passing upon this great question.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if his resolution applies to that character of legislation pertaining to soldiers only? Do you want to restrict it to soldiers?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes, absolutely, to soldiers, sailors, and marines—those who served in the military or naval forces of the United States in the war with Germany. The proposal is that all those measures shall be referred to this special committee, notwithstanding any general rule of the House to the contrary.

The resolution also provides that all of these bills which have been referred to the Committee on the Public Lands and to the Committee on Banking and Currency and the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations, or any other standing committee, shall be referred instantly, upon the passage of this resolution, to this special committee, except bills which may already have been reported out or put on the calendar, and I understand at this time there is only one of those—the Mondell bill.

Regardless of the final character of legislation upon these subjects that may be brought before the House for consideration, I submit that it is not fair to the ex-service men of this country, who have been led to believe, very largely by the action of Members of Congress, that we are going to consider and pass legislation of some sort for their compensation or for their benefit, to longer delay definite action. If you let the situation lie as it is, you will never get any practical result. How many of the committees to which these bills have been referred have had any hearings on them? Can the Republican steering committee give any assurance of early action on any of them? They are silent. What disposition do you find here on the part of those responsible and in authority for legislation in Congress to press for consideration any of these bills and either finally pass favorably upon them or reject them? I think it is only fair to the ex-service men and it is only fair to the taxpayers of the country and it is only fair to the Members of this House itself that we shall not further delay some concrete action upon this legislation, but that we shall determine either to put it into effect and to give some affirmative legislation for the relief or compensation of our ex-service men or else, in justice to them, to announce that it will not be the policy of Congress to undertake legislation of that character.

At the proper time I trust that the Committee on Rules will see fit to give this resolution its earnest consideration. It is not offered in any party spirit. It is offered simply for the purpose of undertaking to solve the problem that every one of you has been thinking about every day since you came back to this session of Congress. The Republican Party, of course, is responsible. You have invited the responsibility. It has been bestowed upon you. It legitimately belongs to you, and the country, of course, will legitimately hold the majority responsible for its action or for its failure to act.

I feel sure that the minority here are willing, as Judge TOWNER suggested in his speech yesterday we ought to do, to cooperate in a definite and specific conclusion with respect to this legislation one way or another.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The gentleman in his opening statement, as I understood, said that he had a list of the bills pertaining to the welfare of the soldiers and sailors.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. I have not a list of all. I inquired at the document room and was informed that there were probably from 65 to 70 bills of various characters.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. You have not a list of the bills?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I have not prepared any. I simply desire to call the attention of the House to my resolution and to ask, if it meets your approval, that you give it favorable action if opportunity is presented. [Applause.]

For weeks and weeks it was intimated that the majority here would wait until the national convention of the American Legion met and made recommendations. That excuse no longer exists. That convention has met and acted. We will see how much longer this policy of inaction and indifference shall continue. If you are going to legislate for the benefit of the men who, above all others, have earned the gratitude of this Nation, you should act and act without delay. If you are not going to legislate for their benefit you should have the courage to say so, and thereby settle the matter once for all, so that the ex-soldiers may not further be encouraged to expect favorable action and may make their plans and arrangements accordingly. In justice to them we can do no less.

Such a special committee as I have suggested can and should agree upon legislation fair and helpful to our veteran soldiers and sailors without imposing any undue burdens upon the taxpayers of the country and without being unduly liberal to the men themselves. Let us not longer "hold the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] has 43 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]; but first I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] 20 minutes, providing he makes a good speech. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know very much about the pending bill, for the reason that I have not had an opportunity to properly investigate it, but I understand this, like certain horse-show rings at country fairs, is a general-utility debate, and a person can declaim on any subject he may feel inclined to discuss.

I do not agree with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] as to some of the statements he made in regard to this bill. He stated, in substance, that in most parts of this Republic the people are greatly concerned about the number of pounds of food they can obtain under food-administration laws and the kind of sacks they may be permitted to put it in. I beg leave to differ from him. The people are more concerned about ways to obtain sufficient money with which to buy food during these times of the high cost of living than they are about the kind of sacks in which to put it, or whether the lettering on the sacks is in color red, white, or blue.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Under the present mode of selling flour the sacks contain 12, 24, 48, and 96 pounds, and there are numerous sacks, of course, in those denominations now in existence. Now, to pass this bill changes all that and makes all these sacks useless, and that is what the gentleman from North Carolina meant when he said that the people were highly concerned about this bill. Instead of getting stuff in the sacks which are now available, they will not get it at all for a while, because new sacks of all denominations must be provided.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, there may be 12, 24, 48, or 96 pounds in the sacks that the gentleman speaks of, but I doubt very much whether they will weigh that much.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] talked about this Republican Congress and what it had failed to do in regard to constructive legislation. I beg leave to differ from him again. This is a great Congress, with a large Republican majority, and I say without jesting it contains many able Republican as well as Democratic Members. This House has enacted one marvelous piece of legislation, which will go down in history through all the ages as the most beneficial and far-reaching legislation to reduce the high cost of living ever conceived by the brain of man provided it passes the Senate and becomes law. In fact, it sprang from the brain of the Ways and Means Committee like Minerva from the brain of Jupiter, full formed and perfect and ready to strike down with one mighty and effective stroke the high cost of living, and no one should be so skeptical or so impertinent as to disbelieve that thing will in due season be accomplished because it is to be done by taking the tax off of ice cream and soda water and supplying the deficit by an increased tax on the real necessities of life. [Laughter.]

As a matter of fact, however, in my opinion the gentlemen who inadvertently or otherwise voted for that bill should return to the expectant and awaiting presence of their constituents and duly and humbly apologize for their action and spend a season of repentance in sackcloth and ashes.

In my opinion—and I do not think I am in a minority in this country in that thought—the best thing Congress can do is to settle decisively once and for all the questions of the peace treaty and league of nations and pass the appropriation bills and go home. It would do Congress good to get out of the profiteering environment and mucky atmosphere of Washington for a time and mingle with their constituents and learn their opinions on current matters.

And that would bring a change of living conditions from cold-storage junk and indifferent cooking to the fresh, pure food and good cooking of the countryside. Congress could there mingle with the thrifty sons and fair daughters of the soil and breathe the inspiration of nobler thoughts and loftier ideals. The frost is now on the "pumpkin," the ripened corn is in the crib, the golden wheat is in the bin, the yellow yams are mellowing and sweetening in the cellar, the succulent persimmon and the toothsome "possum" are now ripened under the cool temperature of frosty, freezing moonlit nights, and all nature is redolent with the perfume of dying flowers and aglow with the varicolored beauty of autumnal forests and the glory and splendor of autumnal sunsets.

And then to contemplate the epicurean richness of a country dinner consisting of country-cured ham; and hog and lye hominy, made only as they know how to make it in Kentucky; accompanied by light, hot biscuits and country-made blackberry jam and other like delicacies; and to crown all, as a final course, a big, fat, juicy "possum," fully made ready for the feast by the fall of several biting frosts upon it and cooked only as an old southern negro "mammy" knows how to prepare such dainty dishes, and the whole fringed with layers of big, tempting, yellow sweet potatoes, exuding sugared sweetness over the luscious marsupial dish in drops of waxen thickness.

Such a dinner is a real and glorious feast, fit not only for a Congressman but for the gods; and after it is over, how pleasant to go to the old log stable and crawl up into the loft as in bygone days and be a boy again, and repose on the new-mown hay as of yore, and be lulled into peaceful sleep by the patter of the rain on the old board roof, and drift away into dreamland unmindful of ambition and the pomp and circumstance and vainglory of the world.

The sooner Congress adjourns to enjoy a well-deserved rest the better off the country will be, and Congress will be benefited mentally and physically, not to say morally.

Mr. Chairman, there is now a great coal strike in this country which is hurtful to the miners and disastrous to commerce and industry. Every legitimate means should be used to avert and settle differences between capital and labor, so that strikes may be prevented and the resultant financial losses avoided, but at the same time capital and the public should keep in mind the fact that the workman is not only entitled to a living wage but is entitled to something to lay by for old age and to tide him over the days when the hand of misfortune may fall heavily upon him.

The district which I have the honor to represent in this House is in part a coal-mining district, and most of the miners belong to the United Mine Workers' organization. In 1917–1918 these miners asked for a raise of wages, but they were refused on the ground that we were at war, and like good citizens they quietly submitted, although they were not then and are not now getting a sufficient living wage to meet the increased cost of living.

After the war was over they again requested a raise of wages to meet the living conditions that confronted them. The miners are loyal citizens. Not an act of disloyalty to the Government so far as I have heard was ever charged against any of them. Over 60,000 of them were in the service of their country as soldiers. They fought for their country with manly fortitude and courage. They never turned their backs to the foe, and their wounds were all in front. Many of them were wounded and crippled for life while others died upon the field of battle and their bodies are buried in Flanders fields—

> Where the poppies blow
> Between the crosses, row on row.

The miners subscribed and paid for more than $100,000,000 in Liberty bonds and in addition gave large sums to the Red Cross and other charitable organizations for the purpose of aiding to win the war. All they are now asking is to be treated with fair consideration in the matter of wages. I have seen misstatement after misstatement about miners wages piled one on another like Ossa on Pelion.

Miners, with the exception of day hands, are paid by the ton for mining coal, and I have never seen a statement from any fuel administrator, newspaper, or Congressman which has attempted to elucidate this question as to how much they are paid per ton for their work. Every statement I have seen about the matter is mere assertion and far-fetched guesswork.

I recently received from the vice president of district No. 23 of the United Mine Workers' of America the following telegram:

> In behalf of 5,000 miners who have been made slaves by the enforcement of the Lever law may I urge you to use your influence to have this law repealed? Our very souls protest against Dr. H. A. Garfield being given the authority to decide the amount of wages the miners shall receive. We understand he is a stockholder in some large bituminous coal mines and receives profits therefrom. My God, has our Government forgotten the service of the miners during the great World War? Not one disloyal act did any branch of our organization commit. We had more than 60,000 men in military service. We bought more than $1,000,000 of Liberty bonds, donated liberally to the Red Cross, etc. August 22, 1918, we made an effort to get better wages for the miner, and the Fuel Administrator said no. We were then engaged in war, and for the love of our country we bowed our head in submission and continued to work until war was over, expecting to be given a liberal wage.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, if Mr. Wilson had not been sick at the time the attempt was made to arbitrate the strike and had been able to give personal attention to the matter the strike would have been settled, and the men would now be at work.

The assertion is made, not based on facts, that the miners at the time of the strike were receiving exorbitant wages and the public has been diligently educated by interested and profiteering persons to place all the fault for the high price of coal on the miners and operators. Recently a Washington newspaper published an interview with a Louisville party as to the wages miners are receiving in the Birmingham, Ala., coal district. He knew, he said, because he had just returned from a trip to Alabama. He probably made this trip in an auto and is no doubt one of those auto miners who know just about as much about mining as city auto farmers do about farming. This city auto miner most likely never saw a coal mine in his life, and the city auto farmer probably never turned a furrow, yet the one can tell all about mining and the other all about farming and just what things should be done and what wages are paid, by intuition probably, owing to the vastness and profundity of their respective intellects.

The Louisville party, as detailed by the Washington paper, said:

> The normal output of that district is 55,000 tons daily and that is what is being produced now—

And he adds—

> The miners are already making exceptionally high wages—from $300 to $400, and in some cases $600, per month—

And he further states that 70 per cent of the miners are at work in that district.

If any miners are making such wages, they are contract miners and such sums are their gross earnings, and out of the gross earnings should be deducted the wages of two or three men, as those mines are machine mines and the wages of the helper and loader should be deducted, and when that is done the wage even of a contract miner will fall far below $300.

In the Birmingham district, which is the Alabama district, according to the United States Bureau of Mines for the year 1918, the latest report available and the year of greatest production, the coal output in that district was as follows:

Number of short tons	19,184,962
Number of men employed	26,221
Average number of days worked	278
Average number of tons mined per man	732

Machine miners and pick miners are paid on a different basis, but their wages are about in amount the same per ton, based on the pay per ton of a pick miner, and that in Kentucky is $0.7735 a ton, and is probably a little less in Alabama. Certainly nowhere in the world are miners paid a dollar per ton for mining; and admitting they are, then, if they mine 732 tons on an average per man a year at a dollar per ton, their average wages in Alabama for 1918 were $732 per year, or just $61 per month, and not $300 nor $400 nor $600 per month as the gentleman from Louisville with such vivid imagination seems to believe, but their wages, based on the actual amount paid per ton for the days worked, is about $566 per year, or about $47 per month.

Of course the 278 days the miners worked in that district represents days and parts of days and not 278 full days' work. The smallness of miners' earnings is not only due to low wages, but also due to the failure of railroads to furnish cars to the mines. Of course, miners could earn more if furnished cars by the railroads. According to the highly decorated imagination of the United States Fuel Administrator miners are receiving $1.50 per ton on an average for mining, so I am informed. That statement can not be substantiated by any earthly facts, because no place do they ever receive a dollar a ton, except, perhaps, in some isolated instances of contract mining. Even if they received $1.50 per ton for mining in the Birmingham district and mined 732 tons for 1918 per man, the wages for the year on an average would amount to $1,098, or $91.50 per month per man, and miners' wages have not increased since 1918, the year of greatest production. They were actually paid per ton about $0.7735, so the average wages per miner in that district for that year were actually about $566 per year per man, or a little over $47 per month, and they are no more now.

The Fuel Administrator states, so I am informed, that a miner can live on $950 a year, although the Secretary of the Treasury resigned because he could not live on $12,000 a year. If that be true, then the Fuel Administrator, in the fullness of his great heart and the abundance of his loving charity, is willing, after allowing a miner and his family $950 on which to merely exist—and most miners have families—to allow him, according to his own statement of the wages per ton received by miners, the further munificent sum of $148 per year to pay for the few pleasures he may indulge in or to carry him over the misfortunes that may betide him or his family.

According to the figures of the United States Bureau of Mines the coal production in Kentucky in 1918 was as follows:

Number of short tons	31,612,617
Number of men employed	39,342
Average number of days worked	230
Average number of tons mined per man	804

If the average wage paid is $0.7735 per ton for mining, then 804 tons per man per year would amount to $623.89 per year, or $51.99 a month. If any man will show me by the signed scale of wages under which the miners are working that this statement is not correct I will be glad to correct the mistake, but this is the information I have received from some of the parties to the contract.

It is stated that the cost of living has advanced about 79.8 per cent and the wages about 58 per cent. Such estimates are, in my opinion, delusive. As a matter of fact, the wages of miners have not advanced since the war began, and in 1917–18 they were refused an advance on account of the war, while the wages in almost every other industry were advanced on account of the war and the increased cost of living, and the advance in living, as everyone who buys knows, has been in most instances over 100 per cent.

As advertised in the Louisville, Ky., papers, the retail price of coal in that city is:

	Per ton.
West Virginia lump	$7.00
West Virginia nut	6.50
Kentucky lump	6.50
Kentucky nut	5.50

The freight cost per ton from most, if not all, the western Kentucky mines to Louisville is $1 per ton, and the maximum price loaded on the railroad cars at the mines is $2.45 per ton; so the coal is delivered in Louisville at a cost of $3.45 per ton, leaving to the retailer a gross profit of $2.05 per ton on Kentucky nut coal and $3.05 on lump coal.

I do not know what the freight rates from the West Virginia coal fields are, but certainly not more than $1.50 per ton, and I have no idea it is that much; but at that rate West Virginia bituminous coal is delivered in Louisville for $3.95 per ton and the lump coal is sold for $7 per ton, leaving a gross profit to the retailer of $3.05 per ton on West Virginia lump coal and $2.55 per ton on nut coal; and yet the coal miner is cruelly and unjustly assailed by the newspapers and the public for the high price of coal. And the prices in Washington City are still higher; but the miner gets the same price per ton for mining the coal that goes to both places.

In addition to this profit, the retailer usually sells 1,800 pounds for a ton, thereby giving 9 tons of coal and charging the same as 10 tons, and making a still further profit of from $5.50 to $7 on each 10 tons of coal sold.

The retailers in many instances are the railroads; so the railroads and the retailers are the ones who are profiteering on the public in the cost of coal, and not the miners and operators. The excess over $2.45 per ton for coal is the gross profit divided between the railroads and the retailers; and in this city, with bituminous coal selling at $7.90 per ton, that gross profit amounts to $5.45 per ton, as the coal is placed on the railroad cars at a maximum price of $2.45 per ton.

Injunction proceedings are pending against a number of miners for alleged violation of the so-called Lever Act. This proceeding is pending under an amendment to the Lever Act which was reported to the House by Mr. HAUGEN, of Iowa, from the Agriculture Committee, August 23, 1919. That bill became a law October 20, 1919. Mr. Lever resigned from Congress, and his resignation was effective August 1, 1919, and he was not a Member of Congress when the bill was reported and passed.

It was never intended by Congress that the Lever bill should apply in such proceedings as the Indianapolis injunction cases. That is a criminal statute and provides a certain named penalty of fine and imprisonment for violation of a criminal law, but it is proposed to circumvent the plain intent of the law and to prevent the trial on a charge for violation of a criminal statute by a jury as all men charged with the commission of criminal offenses are entitled to be tried under the law. In that proceeding the court says one miner shall not furnish money or food to another miner who will not work for the inadequate wages miners now receive. In my opinion that law is the limit of legal oppression. If these miners have violated any criminal law, then they are justly entitled to a trial by a jury as the Constitution of this Republic clearly intends.

The miners and operators are charged with conspiracy to limit the production of coal and thereby enhance the price, but I do not believe there is any foundation for such charge. The miners want all the cars that can be obtained, because the more cars they get the more work they can obtain and the greater their earnings. The operators want more cars because the greater amount of coal they can ship and sell the more profit they can make. The charge is not reasonable as the price of coal aboard the cars is fixed by the Government. In addition, the operators have for two years or more been pleading with the Railroad Administration to furnish more cars to the mines in which to ship coal.

Why are not injunction proceedings invoked or the criminal laws enforced against the railroads?

The so-called Lever law makes it unlawful and provides a penalty for conspiring to limit the facilities for transporting any necessaries or to restrict the distribution of any necessaries, or for any person to do so. The railroads and persons connected with them have, in my opinion, beyond question limited the facilities for transportation of coal, and have restricted the distribution of coal cars to coal mines when they could have furnished them. If they did not, why were grass and weeds growing in the bottom of coal cars sent to Kentucky about 10 days before the strike? These cars evidently were not needed by the railroads in the operation of their own coal mines, and were probably hidden away on sidetracks remote from coal mines to prevent the distribution of coal by independent operators in competition with their own mines.

If they have not intended to and have not prevented the distribution of coal, why have they given a better rate per ton by 40 cents from the coal fields of southern Indiana and southern Illinois to Chicago, Cincinnati, and other competitive points than they have to coal shipped from the competitive field of western Kentucky?

I believe the railroad corporations are endeavoring to get control of the entire transportation system of the country and control of all the coal mines and lands, and if laws are not passed to prevent, I believe they will finally succeed; and one method to get possession of independent coal mines is to limit the distribution of cars to the lowest possible number. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., according to the Louisville Courier-Journal, owns mines which produce 1,400 cars of coal per day, which amounts to about 60,000 tons, and other railroads all over the country own or operate directly or through interlocking directorates vast coal properties.

November 20, 1919, a dispatch from Columbus, Ohio, says:

> Vigorous protest against the alleged delay of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad in setting cars for the mines of the Hazard field of Kentucky was made to Director General Hines and Fuel Administrator Garfield by B. F. Nigh, secretary of the Michigan-Ohio-Indiana Coal Association.
> Complaints of car shortage made to Mr. Nigh from the Hazard field showed that 156 cars were provided, while the mines asked for and were ready to load 500 cars. Coal from these mines is shipped largely to Columbus and Cleveland.

The daily normal capacity in that field is 25,000 tons, and even though but comparatively few mines are in operation that railroad gives as an excuse that its terminals are congested. A scheme worthy of a diplomat. Congest the terminals and tie up the coal cars, and then give as an excuse for not furnishing cars that the terminals, which were no doubt purposely congested, are congested.

In the western Kentucky coal field day hands in mines receive from $3.56 to $4.35 per day, and most of them get $3.56. What gnashing of teeth and wild ululations there would be if the swivel-chair laborers of our cities were confined to such wages!

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. The gentleman from Ohio has 20 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Indiana 9 minutes.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time during my association in this House with the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] that I have not been able to agree with him on every position he has taken before the House. But the gentleman says that there have been no figures given Congress whatever in regard to the earnings of the coal miners.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not now, but later. He says it is merely a guess. Surely the gentleman has forgotten the figures which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODS] placed in the RECORD some weeks ago, wherein he showed that in the mines of West Virginia the miners there named by him had been making from $253.60, as a minimum, per month up to $547.82 a month.

For the information of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] I here insert the said statement made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODS], from page 7589 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Monday, October 27, 1919, to wit:

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. I give the statement, which has been furnished me, as to wages earned for the months indicated for the miners named at the Borderland Coal Corporation mines at Borderland, W. Va.

This is not a union field, but my understanding is that prices corresponding to the union scale are paid. Mining conditions are not exceptional and the miners are not paid higher, or at least not materially so, and the mining conditions are materially no better for the miner than generally prevail in that field. Miners are charged $2 per month per room for frame houses, most of which have bathrooms attached and are sewered, and $3 per month per room for brick houses. They pay for their own powder, which runs from $2 to $9; smithing bills, 50 cents per month; furnish their own tools, consisting of shovel, pick, coal auger, and perhaps an iron bar. They are not charged for timber or propping. Single men pay 75 cents for medical attention and married men with families $1.25 per month.

* * * * * * *

The miner works as many hours as he chooses and is paid by the ton or car. Their average day is from seven to eight hours, but, of course, during the period shown by the following statement there were quite a number of days in which the miners were not working, owing to car shortage. These cases may be exceptional, but are sufficient to show what can be earned by the steady miner. The list is as follows:

The net is after deducting store account, scrip account, powder, rent, lights, coal, smithing, doctor's fee, insurance, and in some instances cash and war campaign fund. These men are not starving.

I have just had a talk with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODS], and he informs me that since he placed the above figures in the RECORD he has ascertained that none of the above named were contract miners, but that the above represents the earnings of the respective individual miners named themselves without helpers. You will note that the amounts in the first column under "gross amounts" are the actual earnings before deducting any expenses, while the amounts in the second column, designated "net amount," are what was left to them out of their month's wages after paying house rent, store accounts, doctor bills, and so forth.

I call attention to the following from the Weekly Digest, published at Washington, D. C., December 3, 1919, on page 25 thereof:

COAL OPERATORS' PAY ROLLS PROVE MINERS WHO WORK WERE PAID $8.10 TO $13.05 PER DAY IN MONTH OF 22 WORKING DAYS.

WASHINGTON, November 26.

The executive committee of the bituminous-coal operators of the central competitive field issued the following statement to-night:

The storm center of the mine-wage controversy to date has raged about the question of percentage of wage advance since 1913 as compared with percentage of increased cost of living since the same date. We can prove and, as a matter of fact, have proved by figures submitted yesterday to the public that on the percentage basis of figuring miners have already been offered by the operators far more than they are entitled to. But even more significant than these percentage statements are the figures of actual earnings in dollars and cents.

The following is a list of miners from different parts of the central competitive field showing average daily earnings taken direct from pay rolls:

William Dewarr	$8.10
Alvin Anderson	8.30
Paul Cases	9.44
Egnot Sessions	8.70
Bruno Ecknovich	8.42
John Martin	8.23
Andrew Bagon	8.26
Edwin Brawley	8.11
Jacob Gullick	9.37
Charles Wise	13.05
Charles Krug	12.10
J. W. Sims	13.03
James Eccleston	12.10
Pearl Patton	9.64
Dave Nichols	9.70

Thousands of others showing similar earnings could be added to this list, and we contend that the figures do not indicate an insufficient wage.

The miners allege that they do not have an opportunity to work a sufficient number of days at wages indicated above in order to secure a proper annual wage. To indicate how much cause the miners have to complain in this matter we have selected a mine pay roll which is typical of all others. This pay roll covers a period of one month, during which the mine worked 22 days, and accordingly offered every miner on the pay roll an opportunity to work the full 22 days. There were 175 men employed at this mine that were on the pay roll during the entire month. Out of this number 46 only presented themselves for work on each of the 22 days; 33 were present at the mine on 21 days; 31 for 20 days; 19 for 19 days; 8 for 18 days; 12 for 17 days; 7 for 16 days; 1 for 15 days; 1 for 14 days; 4 for 13 days; 2 for 12 days; 3 for 11 days; 1 for 10 days; 1 for 7 days; 2 for 6 days; 4 for 4 days; 1 for 3 days.

Are those men who refuse to take full advantage of their opportunities to work, and who prefer to loaf rather than to produce coal, entitled to any consideration at the hands of the public? It is for these men who, through their refusal to work, have brought down the average of the miners' earnings, that the mine workers' organization is demanding an increased wage. We say most emphatically they are not entitled to it. If they will work they will earn; if they will not work it is not up to the mine owners or the public to support them in idleness. On every occasion that the mine wage scale has been advanced during the last few years, the number of these idlers has increased, because they were able to earn all they required in a fewer number of days. It is time to call a halt.

Would the gentleman from Kentucky have us believe that we may better accept partisan estimates guessed at by the Secretary of Labor, who was a high official in the United Mine Workers of America at the time he entered the Cabinet, than the undeniable figures from actual pay rolls from the mines of our country?

Senator KING, of Utah, has well said that—

The Department of Labor is so honeycombed with Bolshevism that it is unfit to handle the cases of persons classed as undesirable in this country.

For the same reason we can not give any credence to estimates made by the Department of Labor on earnings of coal miners. The Secretary of Labor almost caused a rupture in the Cabinet of the United States when he sought to defend the lawbreaking, anarchistic leaders of this cruel coal strike at a time when the Government was trying to perfect plans to prevent hundreds of thousands of helpless women and little children from freezing to death.

If the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS], whom I personally like immensely and whose stand on the floor of this House almost invariably is in behalf of all the people as a whole rather than a particular class, knew as much about the earnings of the miners in his own State as he does about everything else—because he is a well-posted man—or as much as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODS] knows, he could have told exactly what the miners of Kentucky have been earning each month. Ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODS], who went to a man not a week ago in Kentucky and in talking with a miner he said: "Mr. Preston, how many shots does it take for a day's work to accumulate the coal?" He said, "Three." "How much time does it take you to make the three shots?" "About 35 minutes." "How much time does it take you to load a mine car?" "Twenty minutes." "How many mine cars do you load a day?" "From 8 to 12, at least 10 on an average." "How much do you get for loading a mine car?" "Ninety cents a car." So this Kentucky miner, Mr. Preston, had been working four hours a day and making $9 a day loading 10 mine cars of coal.

If you would talk with our colleague, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. REED], and other gentlemen familiar with the facts, they would tell you that there are mines in West Virginia and other States where the miners are being furnished by the operators with the very best brick houses, more comfortable than the one I occupy in Washington, at a very nominal rent, with steam heat, electric light, with coal at $1 a ton at their residence, with a garden plot at the back of the house to raise vegetables for the family, with water to irrigate the garden, with excellent school advantages, and an extra fund added to the school fund to get extra teachers.

These operators have built churches, they have built Protestant churches and Catholic churches, giving them free entertainments at least once a week in the way of free picture shows, and they have done everything on God's earth to make them satisfied, and paid wages from $150 to over $500 a month. Those are facts that are staring us in the face to-day. These miners have more money and property than they ever had before in their whole lives or ever dreamed of having.

Down in my district a Texas blizzard has been raging for a week. Women and little children are freezing to death—just what these anarchistic strike leaders have purposely designed—and during the last 10-day recess, instead of going to my home and enjoying my short vacation, I drove an automobile myself from Youngstown and through other parts of the State of Ohio, over 500 miles, driving through Pittsburgh and across the State of Pennsylvania, trying to find out what the real condition of some of these striking miners is. Why, as I came down through Ohio, about the only thing I could see besides strikers, jocularly speaking, were the cards of my good friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON]. As I came through his district on almost every telephone pole I could see the card posted up—his large printed placard—and you could read it almost a quarter of a block off, "Write Congressman EMERSON, at Washington, D. C., for any bulletin you want. He will send it to you." [Laughter.] In some places the eating houses were designated "The Strikers' Café" and "The Strikers' Hotel."

Now, do the 300 strikes now existing in the United States operate to better the conditions? Can not you see in it the influence—the soviet and Bolshevik influence—not to help the working people of this country but an influence that digs right down at the root and foundation of this Government and is the anarchistic influence that is seeking to disrupt the Government.

Twelve months ago, when I first warned this Congress that labor unions and the American Federation of Labor were dominated by anarchistic influence and that our Government must require all unions to purge themselves of anarchy and disloyalty, I was assailed and bemeaned. If my warning then had been heeded, all of the great suffering now existing in our Nation by hundreds of thousands of helpless women and little children could have been avoided, and the millions of dollars our Government is now spending protecting men who want to work in their right to work without being attacked and killed by striking miners and striking steel workers would have been saved.

After Samuel Gompers has approved of the anarchist William Z. Foster being placed in charge of the steel strike, and has approved of all of his actions, and after Samuel Gompers has approved of the unlawful strike and unlawful actions by coal-strike leaders, and after all of his threats of disobedience to laws should Congress pass them, and his denunciation of Government action, will any unprejudiced person longer contend that he is not himself dominated by Bolshevik and anarchistic influence? Has he ordered the unlawful strikers back to work? No. I hope to God that Judge Anderson will take such action with regard to these 84 strike leaders whom he has summoned before him because of violation of the injunction that it will make them remember it to the longest day of their lives. I hope also the day will come when I can meet and take Judge Anderson by the hand and say, "God bless you, Judge; you are a man; you are not afraid to do your duty; you are not afraid of these anarchists who place bombs at the doors of people who stand for law and order and good government." Yet he is being execrated and condemned by all labor leaders.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] in order that he may address a few well-chosen remarks to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. [Laughter.]

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I attempted to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] a question, but could not obtain that privilege, as the gentleman, when he gets to talking, does not seem to have any terminal facilities. [Laughter.]

I stated that in this miners' wage controversy I had never seen any statement by those opposed to the miners as to wages by the ton miners receive, and I have not. The amount paid miners by the ton has been carefully concealed. They are paid by the ton, and the only correct way to arrive at the amount of their wages is to find out how much they are paid by the ton and the number of tons mined in a month or year and from that amount deduct their expenses in mining that coal, and their net wages in that way can be determined.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODS] delivered a speech in the House October 27, 1919, in which he made certain statements as to the wages received for one month by 42 miners at Borderland, W. Va. It is but fair to Mr. WOODS to state the figures are not his, but were furnished to him by a person in West Virginia whose identity he does not disclose.

The earnings of these 42 miners are approximately the same, and I give only the statement as to the first 12 on the list, which is as follows:

Name.	Month.	Gross amount.	Net amount.
Jno. Postuluk	April, 1918	$254.35	$240.75
Anthony Zimmerman	do	342.42	237.17

Geo. Bays	do	313.05	183.54

The net is after deducting store account, scrip account, powder, rent, lights, smithing, doctors' fee, insurance, and in some instances cash and war campaign fund. These men are not starving.

In the speech of Mr. WOODS it is further stated miners are charged $2 per month per room for a frame house containing two rooms, and from $2 to $9 per month for their powder, 50 cents per month for blacksmithing, 75 cents to $1.25 per month for medical attention.

Let us take the first man on this list, John Postuluk. His gross earnings are stated to be $254.35 and his net earnings $240.75, a difference between his net and gross earnings of $13.60. Then, according to the veracious chronicler who furnished the figures, John Postuluk, if he occupied a two-room frame house at $2 per month per room, paid $4 a month rent, and $2 the lowest amount for powder per month, for blacksmithing 50 cents, 75 cents for medical attention, the total being $7.25 per month, would have left the magnificent sum of $6.35 to pay his store account, scrip account, lights, coal burned in his two-room house, insurance, and perhaps the cash he borrowed and war funds he paid, because the statement says this sum of $240.75 was his net earnings after deducting his store account, scrip account, powder, lights, coal, smithing, doctor's fee, insurance, and in some instances cash and war campaign funds, and this was all paid by the difference between his gross and net earnings, which was $13.60. If this statement could be true, and of course it is not, John Postuluk and his fellow workmen are exceedingly fortunate to be permitted to work in the mines and live at Borderland, W. Va. It is, if the above statement be true, certainly as goodly and fair a village as was ever kissed by the sunlight of heaven, and, like Beulah land, a land of milk and honey and corn and wine, unexcelled except perhaps by the far away celestial city which the olden prophets saw in dreams and visions. Those who are oppressed by the high cost of living in these strenuous times may now joyfully exclaim of Borderland, W. Va.—

This is the place I long have sought
And mourned because I found it not.

But the facts are that mine is a machine-worked mine and the work done by these men was by contract. It usually takes three men to operate a mine machine, a cutter, helper, and loader, and these earnings were most likely divided between the three, and if the services of the loader were dispensed with then the wages were divided between two men, although the amount was paid directly to John Postuluk, the contractor, who paid his assistants.

Because the miners, after waiting for over two years for a raise in wages to which they are justly entitled, and pleading in every possible way that at least a part of their request be granted, finally quit work rather than submit to a continuance of such hard conditions, a Washington newspaper is moved to declare editorially in the fullness of its wrath that—

The public can bring the miners to a realization that they are in the same boat with all other people by the simple expedient of cutting off their food, clothing, water, mail, and other supplies.

In other words, that paper would drive the miners off the face of the earth if they do not tamely work for the wages the nonproducing part of the public demands they shall receive. It would starve and make naked women and little children if the miners dare call their souls their own and refuse to submit to unjust working conditions. Such a sentiment is unadulterated Bolshevism, and is worthy of Lenin and Trotski and the soviet murderers of Russia, who starve women and children in order to compel the people of that oppressed and forsaken land to submit to their demands.

There are various kinds of Bolshevists—the bomb thrower, the poisoner, the parlor Bolshevist, the newspaper Bolshevist, and others, all of the same ilk and kidney, and all of whom should be deported forever out of this Republic. The Bolshevist who advocates class distinction and oppression by starvation of one class in order to compel it to submit to the unjust demands of another and nonproducing class is just as harmful a Bolshevist as the bomb thrower and just as great menace to the stability of the Government, and the same punishment should be meted out to him as to the bomb thrower.

All these various kinds of Bolshevists, newspaper Bolshevists, who advocate the starving of women and children, included, are the unwashed products of anarchistic sentiment, and, like the olden Scottish seers and Roman augurs, claim to foretell most all events with unerring certainty in the advocacy of their diabolical doctrine and promulgate measures which are poison to our civilization and a menace to the liberties of our country. The newspaper which made the above editorial comment advocates more harmful methods than those it condemns in the miners.

The miners stood nobly by our country during the war. Besides leaving a multitude of dead on the battle fields of France, they delved into the mines and furnished the fuel to keep the wheels of our munition factories and all other industries running day and night. They did not hesitate or falter. Had they not been industrious and faithful the fires in every factory in this land would have gone out and the gates would have been closed. The mills would have run slowly or been silent. Every mother's hearts would have been apprehensive and the printed roster of our unfed dead in France would have been much more appalling. Sorrowful faces would have blanched with added terror from one end of this land to the other. Our armies would have melted away. Commerce would have been ruined and wealth destroyed by the billions and this Republic would have become the victim of the greed of Bolshevism and the passion of monarchs.

The baleful gaze of warring millions is now lifted from the red fields of death and battle and the feet of marching armies are turned from the ways of war to the paths of peace, and the coal miners of America deserve as much credit as any other class of citizens for helping to win the victory. [Applause.]

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to a matter that has been pending before the Committee on Foreign Affairs for some time which has attracted considerable attention in the press and elsewhere. That is the question of the return to the United States of the bodies of American soldier and sailor dead buried in France. I want to say that in discussing this matter I trust I shall not be charged with unduly agitating or stirring up any kind of sentiment respecting the matter, because such is not my intention. I am prompted to say what I intend to say this afternoon only by the fact that I am a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which has been conducting a good many hearings upon this subject, and because a good many delegations have appeared before us with reference to the situation.

I have to-day introduced a joint resolution and asked that it be referred to that committee, and I believe if it is passed promptly by the two Houses it will have a very great effect toward persuading the French Republic to lift the present restrictions which prevent the disinterment and return of American soldiers to the United States. The resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution requesting the French Republic to repeal, modify, or suspend the laws, ministerial instructions, and regulations of the French Republic preventing the immediate disinterment and return to the United States of American military dead buried in France, and directing the Secretary of War, upon the French Republic consenting, to take appropriate action to effect such disinterment and removal to the United States of such bodies in cases where requests for such removal are made by the nearest of kin.

Resolved, etc., That the French Republic be, and is hereby, earnestly requested to repeal, modify, or suspend, in so far as same may apply to the bodies of American soldiers, sailors, and marines, the laws, ministerial instructions, and regulations of the French Republic preventing the immediate disinterment and speedy removal to the United States of the bodies of American soldiers, sailors, and marines now interred in France, so that the Government of the United States may remove to the United States the bodies of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, in cases where requests for such return are made by the nearest of kin of such deceased soldiers, sailors, and marines, for burial in the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of State transmit to the Government of the French Republic a certified copy of this resolution.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed, upon the French Republic consenting to such disinterment and removal, to take appropriate and necessary action to exhume and remove to the United States with all reasonable speed and safety and with due ceremony the bodies of all soldiers, sailors, and marines of the American Expeditionary Forces who are buried in France and the return of whose bodies to the United States is desired and expressed by the nearest of kin. The Secretary of War is further directed, upon arrival of such bodies in the United States, to make such delivery or disposition of such bodies as may be requested respectively by the nearest of kin.

Briefly, the situation is simply this: Pending hostilities the American authorities and the French authorities undertook to arrive at some agreement as to when American soldier dead lying in France should be returned to the United States. On account of the great troubles of transportation and the vast machinery of our Army in France, the French Government, at the request of the American military authorities, postponed the consideration of any agreement until after all American forces should have left France. It was purposed that at that time discussions would be taken up with a view to arriving at some definite conclusion between the two countries. Recently the State Department and the War Department have taken up with the French Government the question of arriving at some understanding upon the subject. Up to date the French Republic has declined to permit the disinterment and removal of bodies to the United States prior to January 1, 1922. It has been urged by the French authorities that sanitary considerations, transport considerations, and other things were of such a character as to make it impractical to carry out this policy with reference to their own soldiers, and they argue that to permit the United States to disinter their dead and bring them back to the United States would excite the French people to make the same demands upon their own Government. A great many bills have been introduced upon the subject, as well as several resolutions.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND] some time ago introduced a very elaborate measure providing for the establishment of an independent commission and providing for an appropriation of $50,000,000 and the building up of a machine to carry out this work. The practical difficulties which present themselves with reference to this matter are, first, we must secure the consent of the French Government, and so my joint resolution provides in terms that the two Houses of Congress respectfully request that the French Republic repeal, modify, or suspend its laws, ministerial instructions, and regulations so as to permit the United States to bring back to this country the bodies of such soldiers, sailors, and marines where such removal may be requested by the nearest of kin. The second part of the resolution is a direction to the Secretary of War to proceed with the disinterment, upon the consent of the French Government being obtained, and to bring back to the United States the bodies of those soldiers whose nearest of kin desire and express the wish for that to be done.

The reason these other bills establishing independent commissions should not be adopted lies in the fact that the War Department already has an extensive machinery established for this very purpose. A graves-registration service has been organized for quite a long time and has successfully carried out the disinterment of bodies in isolated graves and centralized them in the great central cemeteries. Therefore if the resolution which I have introduced shall meet with the favor of Congress, nothing further will be needed in the way of legislation to effect the return of the bodies of these soldiers or marines. The graves-registration bureau has already, through the office of The Adjutant General, obtained from a large percentage of the nearest of kin of these soldiers and marines information as to whether or not their return is desired.

And so with this information at hand, and with the other information which the bureau possesses as to the location of the graves and the identification of the bodies, it ought to be comparatively a simple matter, when the French Government consents, to disinter those bodies and return them to the United States. A great deal of discussion has taken place in the public press and on the floor here with reference to propaganda, both for the return of the soldiers' bodies and against the return of the soldier dead. It is a question upon which I take it any propaganda one way or the other is improper. The War Department has been very severely criticized for the statement of the Secretary of War and the statement of Gen. Pershing that the department and Gen. Pershing indulged the hope that the parents and kin of these soldier dead would be content to let their remains rest in France. I do not believe that the expression of that opinion on the part of those functionaries involved any breach of propriety. I take it that the War Department being in touch with this situation and understanding the difficulties involved, nothing improper upon the part of those gentlemen was done in expressing that opinion. Those who favor and have been urging the return of the bodies have very seriously and very bitterly criticized the position of the War Department in that regard. But the Secretary of War has always said that irrespective of the views of the War Department, the War Department had promised to return the bodies of all soldiers whose parents or next of kin requested it and that the department intended faithfully to keep that promise, and I believe that that is true, and it is borne out by the fact that already steps have been taken by the War Department to bring back the soldier dead from every country in Europe with the exception of France, and with regard to France steps have already been taken to bring back the soldier dead whose parents or nearest of kin have requested it who were buried in those areas of France out of what is known as the "zone of the army." The French consented to the disinterment and return of those bodies. So I take it there can be no question about the good faith of the War Department in carrying out the promise which it made, and for that reason the resolution which I have introduced simply directs the Secretary of War to carry out that policy with reference to all bodies in France, and that is one reason why no independent organization should be set up.

But, my friends, the propaganda on this subject, if such it be, has not been made on the part of the War Department or on the part of Gen. Pershing alone. The Undertakers' Association of the United States has become very much concerned about this, and, much to its shame, it seems that it is taking part in an agitation throughout the country to stir up a sentiment that these soldier dead should be returned. Such an effort to commercialize the sorrow of the mothers and fathers of America should be bitterly condemned and denounced, and so far as I am concerned no condemnation could be too bitter or too severe. I hold in my hand a clipping from a newspaper dated September 21, copied from, I believe, the Star, which is as follows:

WILL URGE UNITED STATES FIGHTERS' BODIES BE BORNE TO UNITED STATES.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., September 11.

A demand will be made upon the United States Government by the National Funeral Directors' Association that the bodies of American fallen heroes buried in France be brought home for burial.

At the opening session of the organization's annual convention here yesterday the statement made at the outset of the war that ultimately the body of every American fighting man who made the supreme sacrifice would be brought home for burial was read into the records.

John Moss, national president, of Louisville, in his address declared there is spreading throughout the Nation a universal demand that this be done.

The CHAIRMAN. In compliance with the request of the gentleman the Chair desires to notify him that he has consumed eight minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Chairman. I also have before me here a copy of the Stars and Stripes, a paper published here in Washington by some of the soldiers connected with the publication of the Stars and Stripes of the American Expeditionary Forces. This paper contains an editorial which cites a letter to the trade published in the Casket, in which the writer seeks to make capital of this subject, somewhat in these words:

For nearly every American soldier returned, some funeral director will be called upon to perform the necessary duties of reception and burial.

Then this writer fairly chortles:

"Extra business, gentlemen! Legitimate, patriotic, kindly, sympathetic, remunerative extra business."

Perhaps dimly sensing something outrageous in his own jubilance, he hastens to add:

"No increased death rate, no additional widows and orphans—only the final laying away of America's sons in the bosom of their dear motherland."

The editorial in the Stars and Stripes justly condemns this brazen appeal of the writer in the Casket.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, so far as my own personal feelings regarding this matter are concerned, if I had a son who had fallen in France I would prefer his bones be left at rest in that soil which he sanctified by his death. But as to those parents and to those wives back here in the United States who, in their sorrow and grief, may desire that the bones of their loved ones be returned to repose in their family cemeteries or in a national cemetery, I do not believe that the United States ought to hesitate in its efforts to secure the consent of the French Republic that we may bring back whatever may remain of the once strong and healthy soldiers who left these shores to fight the Republic's battles, to deliver them back, poor remains that they may be but yet sacred to the Nation, to those who loved them in life and who grieve for their death. [Applause.] And while I would not stir a sentiment in the heart of the father or mother who is content to leave those remains in France, I would not unduly agitate a desire to bring them back, because there can be no doubt that in some cases serious disappointment may result. Perhaps terrible mistakes may occur, but there seems to be a great demand throughout the country, as disclosed before our committee and in the hearings before that committee, that many parents, many fathers, many mothers, many widows, desire that those remains be returned to the United States; and I take it that if we should act at all we should act very promptly in this matter, because only a few days ago, under a Paris date line, the statement was made that the French Republic had refused the request made through the State Department a short time ago regarding this matter, and intimated very strongly that if the United States Government should bring pressure to bear the French Government would yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. CONNALLY. Under these circumstances, gentlemen of the committee, when the French Republic is made to understand the great difficulties which our people will experience in visiting France, of the widespread demand for the return of the bodies of our soldier dead, I do not believe the French Republic will refuse to permit the return, especially if it is backed up by a resolution of both Houses of Congress asking that these restrictions be lifted.

I hope to have a favorable report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs on this resolution within a very few days, and I most respectfully request that those of you who are interested in this subject may cooperate in bringing the matter speedily to the attention of the House. If we can pass the resolution, I am confident that the French Republic will relax its objection and permit the removal to be accomplished.

I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] to use his time. I have a few minutes remaining and will yield them to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 11 minutes.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I will yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I am an advocate of standardization and have often spoken in favor of different forms of standardization on this floor. I shall support this bill unless more serious objections are presented than have been brought out in general debate. The contention that because we fix the unit of weight at 100 pounds or the standard barrel of flour at 200 pounds one can not sell any number of pounds except a multiple or certain fraction of this number, as provided in this bill, is not tenable and does not appeal to me. It seems to me that all the bill means is that where a standard bag, package, or container of any kind is indicated it must be at one of these weights, but if a man wishes to buy an odd number of pounds out of a barrel there is nothing in this bill that can possibly prevent it.

I wish to speak about the standardization of another article which is a matter of importance in our industries.

About a year and a half ago, upon my urgent representation, a bill was passed through this House, which later became a law, authorizing the appointment of a commission for the standardization of screw threads. When the word "commission" is used Members of Congress usually prick up their ears and get ready to say unkind things. I think, however, that when the results of the work of this commission are presented it will be found to be in a different class from most commissions that have gone before it.

It was said there would be no expense, or practically no expense, connected with the work of the commission. That promise has been lived up to literally, and although the commission has run nearly a year and a half it has strictly kept to the original representation in that regard.

The membership of the commission consists of the Director of the Bureau of Standards, two Army officers, two Navy officers, and four eminent engineers nominated by the American Society of Mechanical Engineers and the American Society of Automotive Engineers. The commission was appointed September 21, 1917, for a term of six months, which by act of Congress was extended one year, so that the life of the commission, unless again extended, will expire March 21, 1920.

The problem this commission set out to solve was to standardize and simplify screw-thread practice in the industries of the United States. There have been and are many times the number of different varieties of screws actually needed in our industries. Even those described in the same language are not always interchangeable.

The commission has just made a tentative report on its work. I say tentative because it is desired before a final report is made to have the proposed report submitted to the most searching examination and criticism of engineers and manufacturers generally. In my judgment, when this report is made, approved, and promulgated for general use in the industries of the country it will prove to be a monumental work, the effect of which will be widespread and far-reaching. One of the results will be in greatly reducing the number of sizes, varieties, and kinds of screws manufactured. This of itself will be a tremendous saving.

When the report of this commission is generally adopted, hardware dealers may greatly reduce the number and quantity of screws they will have to carry in stock. It will render interchangeable the several parts of machines and other articles manufactured in different factories and in different parts of the country. This will greatly facilitate production in peace as in war. It will enable one factory to produce in great quantities certain parts of articles, while another factory, widely separated, will produce in large quantities other parts. All of these parts may then be brought together in still another place and there assembled. The ability to do this will aid materially in keeping our manufacturing industries abreast of the industrial development sure to follow the war.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What is the standard of measurement? Is it decimal or international?

Mr. TILSON. The standard is worked out in decimal fractions of feet and inches, but so as to be readily translated into the metric system as well.

The adoption of a uniform standard of tolerances in screw threads will increase the dependability of all mechanisms in which screws are used, and among other advantages will add greatly to the safety of travel by rail, by automobile, by steamship, and by aeroplane.

One of the interesting phases considered and reported upon by the commission is screw-thread terminology. It will be a distinct step in advance if in the future the engineer, the manufacturer, and the consumer may use the same language in dealing with this very important subject and if the same terms used in specifications and drawings shall mean the same thing.

The results of the work of this commission will not be confined to the limits of this country. It is sure to take a much wider range. The Screw Thread Commission visited France and England, and there is reason to hope that a uniform standard of screw-thread practice may be adopted internationally. When the work of our commission was submitted to a member of the standards commission of Great Britain, he is reported to have said after examining it for many days that the work had been done with characteristic American speed and British thoroughness.

I shall not now ask to have this report printed as a House document, because it contains a number of tables, plates, and drawings, which would be somewhat difficult and expensive to reproduce, but the report when finally approved and promulgated will be printed as a Government document, and made accessible not only to Members of Congress but to the metal industries generally. I call attention to the matter now, so that the Members of the House who aided in the passing of this bill may know that in so doing they participated in what is destined to be a notable work in American industry.

I can not be unmindful of the fact that when I presented this matter to the House originally, almost two years ago, many Members were kind enough to say that it was largely upon my recommendation that they voted for it, and because of their confidence in me that I would not attempt to put anything through this House that I did not at least sincerely believe was meritorious. I then believed that it would be highly beneficial, and I am more convinced of it now than ever. I have brought it to your attention now so that when the work is finally approved and promulgated you may see what it is for yourselves, and I believe that you will then agree with me that in passing the original bill you participated in a good work. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I understand from the gentleman's statement that it is his judgment that if this report is adopted there will be fewer varieties of bolts to be carried in stock by the dealers than formerly?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. The number will be considerably reduced.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That would be done by having a standard for the bolts?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. And there will be a uniform standard for all bolts, whether an inch, or half inch, or any other size?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. There will be different classes for different requirements. "A" class may be for fine work, "B" class for medium work, and "C" class for work requiring only a loose fit. There may be an additional class, "AA," perhaps, for very fine work. It is all worked out in formulas which will provide a sufficient number of sizes, shapes, and varieties to serve all possible purposes.

In accordance with permission granted there is here inserted a letter from Dr. S. W. Stratton, Director of the Bureau of Standards, and a brief summary by him of the work of the commission:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF STANDARDS,
Washington, October 24, 1919.

Hon. JOHN Q. TILSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN TILSON: In accordance with our conversation the other evening I am sending to you herewith a "Summary of the results of the work of the National Screw Thread Commission," together with some supplementary remarks concerning it. You may modify the form in any way you see fit, or if you desire more detail we would be pleased to extend our statements.

With kindest regards and thanking you for the interest you are taking in our work, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

S. W. STRATTON,
Director Bureau of Standards and Chairman of the Commission.

Summary of the results of the work of the National Screw Thread Commission, authorized by an act of Congress approved July 18, 1919, and extended by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1919.

A tentative report has been prepared by the commission containing complete specifications, tolerances, drawings, and other detailed information necessary for the production of interchangeable screw threads. It is the most complete guide on the subject of uniform screw threads that has been prepared, and will serve as the basis for any future national and international standardization.

This report, which is based on the best present practice in the arsenals, naval gun factories, and private manufacturing plants of the country, will, when approved by the Secretaries of War, Navy, and Commerce, become the basis for all screw-thread work of the various manufacturing plants under the control of these departments. As far as practicable, it will be used in all specifications for screw threads in proposals for articles, parts, and materials to be purchased by the Government. Many manufacturers have already made inquiries for the report with a view to its immediate adoption.

The need for screw-thread standardization was acutely felt by both manufacturers and the Government in the production of munitions of war. The manufacture of separate parts in different factories in various parts of the country and their final assembly at central points involved standardization and interchangeable manufacture to an extent never before attempted.

It is extremely fortunate that the National Screw Thread Commission was appointed at a time when it was able to participate in and take advantage of the screw-thread standardization that had been accomplished during the war for the manufacture of munitions. The commission has correlated the experience gained by the military departments and has put it into form for public use. The "salvage value" of this experience is of inestimable value to manufacturers and users of screw-thread products.

Not only has the standardization work done by the War and Navy Departments been freely drawn upon in the preparation of the report, but that of the engineering societies as well, which have been of the greatest assistance to the commission.

Public hearings have been held by the commission in various industrial centers of the country for the purpose of obtaining first-hand information on this subject from the manufacturers and users of screw-thread products throughout the country. They have given most valuable information and suggestions in regard to their needs and present practices and have shown great interest in the work of the commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired. All time has expired, and under the rule adopted for our guidance the bill will now be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the standard of weights for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, shall be 100 pounds avoirdupois, and the standard measure for such commodities, when the same are packed, shipped, sold, or offered for sale in packages of 5 pounds or over shall be a package containing net avoirdupois weight 100 pounds, or a multiple of 100 pounds, or one of the following fractions thereof: 5, 10, 25, or 50 pounds, and in addition, but for commercial feeding stuffs only, 60, 70, or 80 pounds.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the following words, page 2, line 2, "but for commercial feeding stuffs only, 60, 70, or 80 pounds."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO: Page 2, line 2, after the word "addition," strike out all the balance of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. WINGO. The amendment should really come after the word "pounds."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to modify his amendment?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request that his amendment be modified in the manner indicated?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, this is not a new question. Every session of Congress we have some proposal that involves the right of Congress under the Constitution to establish standard weights and measures. We have no right to go further. I recognize the necessity as well as the right of Congress to fix standard weights and measures, but not to apply them. There is a very clear distinction between saying that a certain thing shall constitute a pound and that so many pounds of a certain article shall constitute a bushel, and that so many inches shall constitute a yard, and that so many grains shall be a dram and so many drams shall be an ounce and so many ounces shall be a pound—there is quite a difference between doing that and in saying that every bottle of Castoria that is sold shall contain 8 fluid ounces or that every barrel of flour that is sold shall contain 200 units or pounds of the standard weight which Congress has fixed.

Why, gentlemen, if we have the constitutional right to say that there shall be 200 of the standard units or pounds in every package of flour simply because we have the constitutional right to fix standard weights and measures, then having the right to say 36 inches shall constitute a yard, on that same theory we would have the right to say that all the coats manufactured and shipped in interstate commerce should be 40 inches long. It is the same kind of a proposition exactly.

Now, let us see what you have here. Let us get down to my amendment. You have a penalty imposed which provides a fine of $500 for a violation of this act. The amendment I have offered is to strike out the words "and in addition, but for commercial feeding stuffs only, 60, 70, or 80 pounds." Do the members of the committee who framed this act know and realize that in every township, in every little community, there are little feed mills run by the farmers, where the farmer puts up the feed first in one kind of a sack that he gets and then in another and sells it by the pound? Yet such sales are "package" sales under this act. Oh, yes; the farmer out in Illinois, running his little old gristmill, using his Ford engine to do it, grinding up foodstuffs, uses sacks, and if they happen to contain 50 pounds or 75 pounds or 88 pounds or 101 pounds, for instance, and if he sells it, what does he do? He has committed a Federal offense under this proposed law and can be fined $500.

Oh, gentlemen, what a miserable, petty business this is when you go into it, trying to say how people shall put up their goods.

You now have a law to make them brand every sack of flour that is sold with the weight, and the law requires a correct statement of the ingredients. That prevents fraud, but this proposal goes further and changes the customary standard sizes. The committee report admits that the standard barrel of flour is 196 pounds, and you frankly admit that you are going to change the standard to 200 pounds. I am in favor of the statute which says you must put on the containers the net weight and the ingredients, but when you come to say that the American manufacturer, whether he be a little farmer, putting his own product into a package to be sold, or whether he be the proprietor of a great milling plant, shall be permitted to sell in interstate commerce packages of only a certain size in a certain shape is absolute folly. Nobody but a crazy socialist would ever favor it if he understood what it meant. It is nothing but foolishness gone to seed, and that is what socialism is. No wonder you have people in this country sore at the Federal Government. The first thing you know you will undertake to standardize clothing, saying coats shall be so many inches long and ladies' skirts so many inches short. You have people who advocate standardizing clothing. You have people who advocate standardizing shoes. You have people who advocate standardizing neckties, making them so wide and so long. You have one darned fool who is advocating that we undertake to have a winter thermometer. Why, it is in keeping with that crazy idea of the conservation of daylight, that daylight-saving law that we tried that was such a joke. Oh, yes; you are going to make this farmer use only 60, 70, or 80 pound sacks in which to sell his feed stuffs. Why, to save his life he could not get them uniform. One sack would weigh a pound or two more than another, owing to the difference of the weather, the dampness that might be in the stuff at the time he packed it.

What miserable business has Congress come to when it goes into petty, little things like that at a time when there is unrest throughout the country, at a time when every man who believes in representative government ought to realize that instead of dabbling in little things like this we should as quickly as we can, consistently with war conditions, take our hands off private enterprise. I am sick of the Federal Government dabbling in such petty business. We have fixed the standard of so many pounds to constitute a bushel of the different grains. That is all right. We require them to label the sack and packages with what is in it and the weight, so that the purchaser shall not be deceived. That is all right. Say that no one shall put up anything except wholesome stuff and that the container must state what the ingredients are. Go further and prevent the sale of partially filled packages. Such laws are all right from the standpoint of protecting the public health and preventing fraud; but to say that you must use packages of only certain sizes and weights, and if you use one of a different size, though correctly labeled and full, you shall be punished as a criminal is foolish and unnecessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am always entertained and generally instructed by the speeches of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], though I have heard this particular speech, either from him or from some one else, a great many times since we commenced agitation of the pure-food law in Congress, and afterwards in connection with the passage of various bills fixing standards of measures for various commodities.

The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have the right to fix the standard of weights and measures; not merely the standard of weights but the standard of measures; not merely to say what shall constitute a hundred pounds, if it so desires, but to fix the standard of the measure of the article itself. We have exercised that power in a few cases. I do not now recall which was the first bill that came up, but there was a very strenuous fight over it on the floor of the House a number of Congresses ago. There was afterwards a considerable contest over the lime-barrel bill. There was some contest over the apple-box bill, and I think my distinguished friend from Arkansas made this same speech on the apple-box bill, though I may be mistaken as to the identity of the person who made the speech. That is my recollection.

Nobody has ever heard a single complaint from any source whatever as to the workings of those laws which were passed fixing the standard of measure of various commodities. Before that no one knew what he was getting, and there was constant attempt at fraud and deceit by reason of the variation in the measures which were used in selling and handling these commodities.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. When the gentleman goes down to the market and buys a sack of flour and it shows on the container the weight—8 or 12 pounds—he can not be deceived about the weight, can he?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I had charge of the pure-food bill when it was passed and became a law. I first brought into the House in the pure-food bill a provision requiring that the quantity of the contents should be stated on every package containing food. Why, such a howl as went up from a lot of canners and manufacturers in this country has rarely been equaled since. The distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], whom we did not then have the honor of having with us, would have been opposed to that provision if he had been here. After a warm debate the House struck out that provision on the motion of a gentleman who was afterwards Vice President of the United States, and a broad-minded statesman, too, Mr. Sherman.

The House struck it out. I said to the House then, "Whenever you prevent fraud in one direction and leave a loophole in another the people who want to commit fraud will quickly find the loophole; and, though you may strike out a provision for putting on packages the quantity of the contents, there will soon come a time when the men who handle groceries throughout the country will come and demand that we put it on." It was not very long until these same gentlemen who had agitated and succeeded in carrying the agitation by a majority in this House came to me while I was chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce and begged me to formulate a proposition which might be put through to put that into the law, and I did it, and it became the law. And nobody has ever complained about it since except those who want to commit fraud. But merely putting the quantity and contents on many packages is not sufficient. I defy any man in this House to tell the difference between a sack of flour containing 40 pounds and a sack of flour containing 35 pounds merely by looking at it. I brought into the House on the pure-food bill can after can of the same article and defied men who were fighting me on the proposition to come and tell which was the larger of two cans by looking at them. When they would come down and pick out the smallest for the largest I would put the cans on the scales and show them that they could not tell.

The person who buys these things buys largely by the looks, and it is a fraud upon him to have one man selling flour in packages of 40 pounds and another putting up packages of 39 pounds and 35 pounds, or somewhere between, and making the purchaser believe that he is getting the same quantity of flour possibly at the same or a slightly reduced price.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The greatest difficulty which was found in connection with putting the net quantity on the containers was the fact that it is impossible to manufacture two containers of exactly the same size. Even when you do it by machinery two containers will not contain precisely the same amount. You can not make two bottles which will contain precisely the same quantity. You can not make two boxes or two barrels or two sacks that will contain precisely the same quantity, and that was the great difficulty.

We finally solved that by putting a provision in the law that variations would be allowed and that tolerances should be fixed by the Department of Agriculture.

This bill provides for such rules and regulations which shall include reasonable variations and tolerances which shall be allowed.

No one has ever complained, so far as I know, about the tolerances fixed by the Department of Agriculture, fixed in connection with the pure-food law, although it covers an almost innumerable number of cases. There is no difficulty whatever in fixing tolerances under the provisions of a bill like this which will safeguard any man who tries or pretends to be honest.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Will there be any less difficulty in making a 200-pound barrel than a 196-pound barrel?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Not at all.

Mr. WINGO. How does the gentleman's argument go to the point in question?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from Arkansas was undertaking to say that this would penalize a man on the farm who was trying to put up an 80-pound package if he got a little over or a little under. That was the substance of the argument that I was trying to demolish.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will permit me, perhaps I was unfortunate in using 1 pound, but take, for instance, a gunny sack, and he puts up the mill product to the amount of 94 pounds. Under this provision he would be penalized, for they would not allow a variation of 14 pounds.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; and the man would not put it up in a gunny sack in that way. He would only try to do it when he was attempting to commit a fraud.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, no; they do it in order to prevent buying expensive sacks.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gunny sacks will be of a certain size.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Would the gentleman say that we are fixing a standard package of flour by saying that the container shall have 200 pounds when the container itself might be large enough to hold 250 pounds?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The container, I take it, under this provision will be large enough to hold 200 pounds.

Mr. WALSH. And it might be large enough to hold 250 pounds.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not think so.

Mr. WALSH. I think this language would permit it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That sort of a fraud is now being committed. They make a large container and print the contents of the package in small letters, so that the container looks as though it contained a great deal more than it does. They put the weight in letters that do not attract attention. There can be no possible objection, where there is a reason for it, to the Government fixing these standards so that they are universal throughout the country. I am as strenuously opposed as anybody to the Government attempting to regulate the business activities of the country. I do not think that is the duty of the General Government. But we are the only power that can make a uniform standard of measure, and whenever it has been exercised it has been for the benefit of everybody who was either a producer or a consumer. It seems to me that that would be the case by the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the language of section 2 correctly, it would seem to fix the standard package by stating that the standard package shall be those containing units of avoidupois weight of 100 pounds and multiples of 100 pounds or the following fractions. You might have a barrel to contain 100 pounds of flour which would be large enough to contain 150 pounds. I do not think you are establishing a standard package by stating that this package must contain if it is sold for a standard package of 100 pounds——

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Is the gentleman arguing for illustration, because we have not yet read section 2, to which he refers?

Mr. WALSH. I was simply arguing for illustration. Section 1 fixes the standard weights for certain commodities and the standard measure for such commodities when they are shipped, sold, or offered in packages of 5 pounds or over, but section 2 of the measure fixes the standard package, and I see nothing in that language or in any other language that would permit the required weights which are fixed as standards to be sold in other-sized packages which would be capable of holding more than the required standard, and I would like to have some member of the committee explain whether in selling these commodities in various weights and multiples or fractions of 100 pounds it is permitted to sell them in packages large enough to hold more than 100 pounds or whether the container must be of such size that they will hold the number of pounds, the multiples or fractions of 100 pounds, or the 100 pounds which are mentioned as the size of the standard package.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I think the same difficulties arise and the same objections apply to this measure as applied to the standard apple barrel and box and all other container laws that we have passed. I think the difficulty arises in the minds of Members because of confusion of thought and because of lack of accuracy and clearness of statement, thereby confusing the object and purpose of the legislation. A man can sell all of the apples he desires or all of the flour that he wants to, and he can sell it in any form that he chooses. This bill has nothing to do with that matter. I think a close examination of the language will show that the object and purpose of the bill is to say that when dealers put on the market and sell in standardized packages the flour or any of the commodities mentioned in the bill the commodity shall be in these different easily ascertainable and identified quantities. For instance, if a man should put, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], flour in a package containing 35 pounds and flour in a package containing 40 pounds, ordinarily on the market, the purchaser merely looking at the package could not tell whether he was getting 35 or 40 pounds. In order that that fact may be easily ascertained, or as easily as possible, so that there may be no fraud on the purchasers whenever this class of commodities is placed on the market, the requirement is that the packages shall be as they are stated here, so that it can be ascertained whether or not he buys a 5 or 10 or 25 pound package of the commodity purchased.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Let us take one of the standard forms sold. A man wants an 8-pound package of flour. It is marked 8 pounds in red letters on the package. He wants a 12-pound package of flour, and that is marked 12 pounds, and the same is true of a 24-pound package or a 48-pound package. Will the gentleman please explain to the House how it is easier to perpetrate a fraud on a man selling a 48-pound package, marked 48 pounds, than it would be if he sold a 50-pound package, marked 50 pounds? Where is there any opportunity for fraud in one that there is not in the other?

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman asks a question that I can not answer. I could not be frank and say that I could say whether or not there was any difference, but that does not reach the proposition involved.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. In a moment. That is not the proposition that is before the committee. The proposition before the committee is, Shall we do as we have done before, make these packages so that these people will understand readily what they are purchasing, so that they will know by the mere appearance of the package, so that it can be always understood, so that when a purchase is made it will be made for a definitely ascertained amount, and that the purchaser can not be deceived either directly or indirectly by concealing the markings or by obscuring them in any way? I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. PADGETT. Along the same line of thought, that there may not be confusion and misunderstanding from looking at the package, I direct the gentleman's attention to page 2, line 2—but for commercial feed stuffs only, 60, 70, or 80 pounds.

Will the buyer looking for a 60 and 70 pound package be able to distinguish them? Can not a 60-pound package be put off on the purchaser as a 70-pound package just as easily as a 35-pound package could be put off for a 40-pound package, which the gentleman illustrated a moment ago?

Mr. TOWNER. I think that that particular portion of the section is subject to that criticism.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. It occurred to me that ought to be stricken out.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Is it the gentleman's contention that it can be sold in other packages than these standard packages?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes, certainly; but if a man puts these packages out and sells them as standard packages he would be liable. For instance, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] told about the farmers not being allowed to sell a gunny sack full of flour or bran, or whatever it may be. Of course, the farmer never attempts to standardize his package nor to sell his goods in standard packages.

Mr. HAUGEN. That is also true of the millers in inland towns.

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. The bill provides that it shall be unlawful to pack, offer for sale, and so forth, "when in package form." Does that imply a standard package only?

Mr. TOWNER. It implies that if they are to sell in package form that they must conform to the requirements of this law. There is certainly no requirement in the bill that makes a man sell only in package form.

Mr. HAUGEN. Well, flour sold in a grain sack, is that in package form?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly not.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is only in the standard package?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The custom in my section of the country, and maybe in the gentleman's section also, where the people who own a little gristmill, a corn-meal mill, where they charge a toll for grinding, of course their compensation is based upon the ability to dispose of the toll which they collect.

Does the gentleman from Iowa think that if one of those millers honestly made a mistake in the weight of a package in putting it up to sell in a sack or an available receptacle to him for that purpose that this system of tolerance that Mr. MANN referred to, or allowance that would be made, would protect a man of that sort in a mistake in putting up his package?

Mr. TOWNER. Unquestionably, if it was a slight variation. Let me say to the gentleman that the little man never sells in packages. This law would never apply to him, or very rarely indeed. He does not put it up in packages to sell as packages.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In my section of the country that practice does obtain, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNER. It might be possible, of course. I do not know how extensive it might be, but I do not believe the man who is just engaged in the custom-milling business would pretend to sell in standard packages or put anything produced in the mill in standard packages. I do not think he would attempt to do that, and therefore this law would not apply.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Suppose as a matter of fact that they do that in some sections of the country and he puts up a package which shrinks in weight and when checked up by the Government inspector it was found to be 2 or 3 pounds under the standard weight. He would be subject to prosecution, would he not?

Mr. TOWNER. If he should attempt to sell the standard packages, certainly he would be under the requirements of this act, and in that case the shrinkage in weight with a slight variation certainly would not make him liable to the penalty as prescribed in this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It says so in section 3. There is a penalty imposed in section 3——

Mr. TOWNER. Section 5 takes care of that.

Mr. PADGETT. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to get the gentleman's idea of the definition of a package. I want to ask how you can sell bran or ground feedstuffs or any of those things except in a package? Would not any quantity which is sold, whatever that quantity might be, constitute a package?

Mr. TOWNER. I think not, if you have a single package, because that would not be a standard package.

Mr. PADGETT. Why not? The difficulty I have in my mind is to get the gentleman's definition of a package. The gentleman says "a standard package." Of course, if he puts it in a package and marks it as 50 pounds, that would be a standard package; but suppose that he had flour and that he had just a lot of flour and possibly that would be 410 pounds of flour or 465 pounds of flour. That would not be a sale in bulk, but that he put it in one package. Would not that be a package?

Mr. TOWNER. It would not be a standard package, as the gentleman can easily see.

Mr. PADGETT. You could get him because he did not sell in a standard package?

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, I think the gentleman is imagining a thing that no one would ever by any possibility of twist or turn of interpretation claim can be brought under this law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made a few moments ago by printing a short summary of the results of the work of the National Screw Thread Commission by Dr. Stratton, which I failed to ask permission to do at the time I made the remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated by him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request with regard to the remarks I made a while ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers a substitute to the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. HUTCHINSON for the amendment offered by Mr. WINGO: Page 2, line 3, strike out all of line 3 and insert in lieu thereof the words "not less than 100 pounds when packed."

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Chairman, I have two objects in view in offering this substitute. In the first place, we are talking about reducing the cost of living, and this amendment confines it to bran and middlings or any by-products of a wheat mill or corn mill, to be sold in packages of 60, 70, and 80 pounds. With commercial feeds now, the custom is to sell in 100-pound sacks. By reducing the number of packages you reduce the cost of a ton of feed, and the consequence is that you add $130 per ton on every ton of commercial feed that you sell by selling 80 pounds to the sack.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I will.

Mr. GARRETT. Is there not this danger in the gentleman's amendment, that it would prevent the smaller package from being put on the market, and that a very large number of people might not, for financial reasons, be able, conveniently at least, to purchase more than a small package? That has been rather in my thought.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I do not think this bill will affect any man who takes a bag to the mill and gets 50 pounds of bran because it is not stamped.

Mr. GARRETT. Of course, I know that. But the raiser of poultry in the city, of course, can not go to the mill and get his poultry feed. He may not want to buy in such large quantities as 100-pound sacks. The thing that has been in my mind is whether the bill does not require a package that is too large by making a minimum of 60 pounds.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. The original package must be standard at a certain weight.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman construes the act to mean that a retail dealer could break the package and sell in smaller quantities than the package?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. If that construction is correct, perhaps it might meet the objection.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield to a suggestion? There is nothing in this language that would prevent the packer from putting up 25 pounds of feeding stuff.

Mr. TILSON. Or 5 pounds.

Mr. WELLING. Or 5 pounds.

Mr. WINGO. That is the object of the bill.

Mr. GARRETT. If I understand, though, the amendment proposed by the gentleman would provide that they could not put up less than a 100-pound package.

Mr. WINGO. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. WELLING. I think that is the object of the amendment. But as the bill reads he can put it up in smaller packages of 5 or 10 pounds, say.

Mr. BLANTON. Not feedstuff.

Mr. GARRETT. I think the gentleman is correct about the bill. It was the amendment I was addressing myself to.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from New Jersey yield for a question?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. For a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that almost every class of feedstuff that the farmers or stockmen buy is put up in 100-pound sacks?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Generally.

Mr. BLANTON. And should not be changed.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. And should not be changed.

When a miller makes bran or any feedstuff from corn-mill products, there is a certain amount of moisture in it, and if a man puts up a ton of bran in Minnesota and it is shipped East, or anywhere else, it takes five or six weeks, and a certain amount of moisture dries out of that sack, and it generally runs from 2 to 3 pounds short. Under this bill the man that sells the bran or middling, or whatever it is, is liable to a penalty of $500, and I do not think that is right. If it is so packed that it contains 100 pounds when packed, I do not think we ought to hold the seller or the retailer or the man that handles it six weeks or two months or three months after that, make them liable under this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. This bill relates to a variety of packages and provides the weight that those packages must contain. That weight must necessarily in every case be the weight when packed?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. If there is to be an amendment of that sort, should it not be an amendment placed in the bill so as to clearly apply to every package and every standard, instead of one package and one standard?

Mr. HUTCHINSON. I have an amendment to that effect.

Mr. MONDELL. That is one provision in the bill, if that is necessary. It does not seem to me that it is necessary. When you say that the package shall contain a certain number of pounds it must contain that number of pounds when the package is filled.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. VESTAL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana rise in opposition to the substitute offered by the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes. I wanted to say that I do not believe the substitute ought to be adopted. The standard for commercial foodstuffs is fixed at 60, 70, and 80 pounds, in addition to the other standards authorized, and that was put in this bill after hearings which were convincing to the committee. It was more for the purpose of taking care of these conditions in the West than anywhere else. A farmer in the West, for example—so the committee understood from the hearings—takes his wheat to the mill and uses these same containers again, or desires to use the same containers, in buying feedstuffs. This container in which he takes the wheat to the mill will not hold 100 pounds of feed. Probably it will not hold 90 pounds of feed. The result is that it is deemed advisable to protect the consumer in the amount he shall receive. We fix the standard at 60, 70, and 80 pounds, because it was represented to us that these containers would hold 60, 70, or 80 pounds instead of holding 100 pounds.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. Is it the purpose of the committee in making these different kinds of packages to say that the farmer when he goes to the mill shall have his feed put up in 60, 70, and 80 pound sacks?

Mr. VESTAL. I think not.

Mr. WELLING. Then why do you put it in?

Mr. VESTAL. If the farmer goes there and they are permitted to put 100 pounds in one of these sacks, suppose they have a number of those sacks filled and turn the filled sacks back to the farmer when he leaves his grain there; they say that contains 100 pounds.

The farmer could not tell whether there was 90 pounds or 100 pounds in the sack. It would not mean that the farmer would have to use the same container that he used in taking his wheat to the mill, but containers of the same kind that might be filled with commercial feed, which he takes in return for the wheat. I hope this substitute will be defeated. It does not prevent the miller from putting up packages containing 100 pounds, but adds the 60, 70, and 80 pounds that containers used by the farmer may be used.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I hold in my hand a copy of a law passed on October 22, 1919, which is an amendment to the food-control act, providing for the adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement of foods, feed, and containers primarily designed for containing foods, feed, and fertilizer, and investing in the President the power to make regulations essential to carry out the purposes of the act. What effect would this bill that we are passing have upon the act I have referred to, or what effect has that act upon the bill we are engaged in passing?

Mr. VESTAL. I can not say. I have not looked into the situation enough to give an intelligent answer.

Mr. GARD. We have the law of October 22, investing in the President the power to make regulations, and the amendment we put in, I will say to the gentleman, was in regard to the container primarily designed or intended for carrying food, feed, or fertilizer. Of course, the container is a very important element in the transmission of food and feed, as the gentleman knows. We have this law, approved on October 22, a little over a year ago, investing in the President the power to make all necessary regulations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. That is the cold-storage act?

Mr. GARD. No. That is the food-control act.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas moves to strike out the last word of the substitute. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the debate on the substitute has disclosed more fully the trouble and the danger of this bill. What is the custom in the Southwest? There might be a different custom in the Northwest or in the East, but, for illustration, I happen to know that there are different customs existing in some of the States.

Take, for instance, a great State like Texas. That part of it that is fed from one class of mills has a different custom from that part which is fed from another class of mills. There is a different custom in my district from what there is in the other part of the State of Arkansas, because my district happens to be furnished with foodstuffs from mills in Oklahoma City and in certain points in Kansas.

The gentleman from Iowa, Judge TOWNER, is very badly mistaken when he says that in the State of Iowa there are no such small feed mills as I suggested, because I have seen them in the State of Iowa, and one farmer that I know in my district, who I think would be affected, is an Iowa man who moved into my district.

Now, how do these community feed establishments get their sacks? They do not go and buy commercial sacks. They buy from the farmers and from the boys any kind of sacks they can get.

They actually use for one kind of ground feed stuffs fertilizer sacks after they are washed. Now, suppose a man is grinding feed and he grinds up corn and cobs together. He will turn out a lighter product from corn that has a large cob than from corn which has a smaller cob. Yet that miller uses containers, because that is the only way he sells. He does not go and scoop it up and sell it out of a barrel and say, "I will give you so many pounds." He puts it up in sacks. Now, you already have a law that protects the purchaser against fraud. The miller has got to put the weight on it. The farmer is not going to be defrauded any more by permitting him to have a sack that has stamped on it or written on a tag, "90 pounds," than he will if it is 60 or 70 or 80 pounds. The main thing is for the farmer to understand what he is getting, and if it is written or stamped upon the package he is protected from fraud.

I usually listen to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] with a great deal of interest. I listened to him to-day. He said I would have been opposed to a certain act which was passed here, which is now the law, to protect against fraud. He is mistaken. I should have been in favor of it. He was making his argument in defense of the present law and he did not answer my objection to this bill.

Well, just take the substitute. If the substitute is adopted and a farmer owning one of these small mills sells a package of this coarse, heavy feed stuff, he will be using an ordinary bran sack, and there is not one bran sack in this country that will hold a hundred pounds of that ground coarse feed stuff.

It may in the gentleman's State, up in the Northwest, where they use a different class of feed stuffs. They will use a more concentrated feed in a cold climate than they will in a mild climate like mine. I should like to see you stuff a hundred pounds of ground coarse feed stuff of the kind that is used in my district into an ordinary gunny sack that they use. You could not do it unless you used a compressor that would burst the texture of the sack. It shows how ridiculous it is to put an arbitrary standard for the whole Nation that will result in fining a miller $500 if he uses any other standard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. I move to strike out the last four words.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee for five minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. I want to ask a question for information, and I will eliminate everything except the question of shipment. In section 1 it says:

That the standard of weights for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, shall be 100 pounds avoirdupois, and the standard measure for such commodities, when the same are packed, shipped, sold, or offered for sale in packages of 5 pounds or over, shall be a package containing net avoirdupois weight 100 pounds, or a multiple of 100 pounds, or one of the following fractions thereof: Five, 10, 25, or 50 pounds, and in addition, but for commercial feeding stuffs only, 60, 70, or 80 pounds.

Then in section 7 it says:

That this act shall not be construed as repealing the act of July 28, 1866, chapter 301, Revised Statutes United States, sections 3569 and 3570, authorizing the use of the metric system, but such sections shall not be construed as allowing the packing, shipment, or offering for shipment, sale or offering for sale of packages of any sizes other than those established as standards herein.

Now, they use the word "shipment" there, "but such sections shall not be construed as allowing shipment of packages of any sizes other than those established as standards herein."

This law is general and applies to everybody. Here is a man that has 187½ pounds of flour or feed stuff that he wants to ship. Can he ship it from one State into another? Leave out the question of sale and all other questions except the one of shipment; he wants to ship a package of flour containing 187½ pounds. Can he ship it without violating this law and incurring the penalty? This applies to shipping in the alternative as well as sale.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that all debate on the substitute and amendment is now exhausted, and the pro forma amendments of the gentleman from Tennessee, the gentleman from Arkansas, the gentleman from Iowa, and the gentleman from Massachusetts are withdrawn.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, would not a vote on the substitute and the amendment to perfect the section be in order before a motion to strike out the entire section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it would, and the Chair will so hold. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New Jersey to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HAUGEN. Can we have the amendment reported?

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VESTAL) there were 12 ayes and 23 noes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I shall be compelled to make a point of order, not out of resentment, but this is so radical a provision that I think we ought to have more than 35 Members here, and I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9755) establishing a standard of weights and measures for wheat-mill and corn-mill products, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment and allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. GARRETT. I would like to ask the gentleman if he can advise the House what will probably be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. I think the Private Calendar.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for the reading of the bill for such amendments as may be offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. McLEAN. Is the Senator from Iowa willing that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside that I may call up the conference report on Senate bill 2472?

Mr. CUMMINS. I realize the importance of disposing of the conference report, and if its consideration does not consume more than half an hour, or something like that, I am willing to comply with the request of the Senator from Connecticut. I suppose there is no way to test it but to ask unanimous consent that the pending bill may be temporarily laid aside for the purpose only of the consideration of the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is absent. He is a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and offered a number of amendments when the bill was before the Senate, amendments which impressed the Senate so favorably that they were incorporated in the bill, changing its character in some respects. I am very certain from a telegram received from him to-day, which I saw, that he desires to be here when this conference report is considered. I dislike to object to its consideration at this time or to laying aside the unfinished business, but I trust the conference report will not be brought up in his absence.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. In addition to what the Senator from Wisconsin has stated, I will say that I have a telegram this morning from the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], and in the telegram he says that he thinks it would be a mistake for the Senate to recede from its amendment relating to double liability, and he expresses the hope that the Senate will send the report back to conference and that the Senate conferees will insist upon the amendment.

Mr. McLEAN. Is there any request in the telegram that action upon the report be postponed until the Senator from North Dakota returns?

Mr. SMOOT. In the telegram which was sent to him yesterday he was not requested to give his opinion upon that subject and there is no expression in his telegram other than that he hopes the Senate will send the conference report back to conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The secretary of the Senator from North Dakota showed me a telegram this morning, which I read somewhat hurriedly, in which he stated that he would return early next week, and that he had wired the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that he wanted to be present when the conference report is considered. That is my recollection of the telegram. I can get the telegram in a short time and submit it to the Senator; but I know so well that the Senator from North Dakota desires to be here when this report is considered that I feel warranted in appealing to the Senator from Connecticut not to take it up in his absence. Since he is a member of the committee and took such an interest in the bill and proposed so many amendments that were adopted in the Senate which really reconstructed the bill, I think it is a very reasonable request to make. He will be in the Senate early next week, and I urge that this conference report be held until his return.

Mr. McLEAN. It seems to me if the Senator from North Dakota wanted action postponed upon the conference report he would have communicated with some member of the committee. I want to do everything I can to accommodate the Senator, but there is only one section of the bill over which there is any controversy, and that relates to the double liability of stockholders. All the other amendments suggested by the Senator from North Dakota were adopted. Not only that, but other safeguards were thrown around the bill in the other House, and it passed that body unanimously.

It is a bill the subject matter of which has been under discussion here for more than a year; a bill very similar to this bill passed the Senate a year ago. It is very important that something should be done. I do not believe that sending the bill back to conference will change the report, and, while I should be glad to accommodate the Senator from North Dakota, it seems to me that he should have requested a postponement. I do not see anything in the telegram that indicates anything more than a suggestion that the bill be sent back to conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, there is something more in the telegram which I saw. In reply to the suggestion that the Senator from North Dakota has not communicated with any member of the committee, perhaps that is because he understood that the committee very largely had no sympathy with the views he entertained and which he had expressed on the floor of the Senate regarding the bill. The Senate, however, had sympathy with those views, and the Senate materially changed the bill after it was reported by the committee in accordance with the views expressed upon the floor by the Senator from North Dakota, who is himself a banker and a man who understands and is entirely competent to discuss these questions.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And, Mr. President, I will say, to cut the matter short, that there will not be any consideration of the conference report by unanimous consent; there will not be any laying aside of the pending business by unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the conference report, in the absence of the Senator from North Dakota, if I am present when the request is made.

Mr. McLEAN. If it is in order, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is always in order.

Mr. McLEAN. I take that responsibility because I feel that it is as important as is the pending legislation. The exchange conditions in Europe are very serious, and unless something is done to assist our associates in the late war in maintaining their credit and their confidence in their political and industrial future, it will mean that the Treasury of the United States will have to go to the rescue or we shall lose all that we have so far loaned. I do not believe that the Senate will insist upon imposing a double liability upon the stockholders of these finance corporations. None of the reasons which ordinarily justify the imposition of a double liability apply to them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Connecticut insists on his motion, the Chair will state that the rule in reference to the matter reads:

RULE XXVII.

REPORTS OF CONFERENCE COMMITTEES.

The presentation of reports of committees of conference shall always be in order, except when the Journal is being read or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending, or while the Senate is dividing; and when received the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put, and shall be determined without debate.

If the Senator from Connecticut insists upon his motion, that is the rule relating to the consideration of conference reports.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Unanimous consent was asked temporarily to lay aside the unfinished business, and to that I object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; the Chair so understands.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That clears the record as to that matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That clears the record as to that. Now, the only thing the Senator from Connecticut can do is to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I renew my request that the bill under consideration be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] has the floor. Does he insist on the consideration of the conference report?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I understand this is not a debatable question, but I should like to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that if we had any assurance that the Senator from North Dakota would be here on Monday or Tuesday I should dislike very much not to extend every possible courtesy to him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will defer for a few moments any request that he proposes to submit or any motion that he proposes to make or any right that he proposes to avail himself of under the rules to bring the conference report before the Senate, I will send for the telegram which the secretary of the Senator from North Dakota has, and the Senator from Connecticut can judge for himself exactly what to expect with regard to the Senator's return. I know it states that he is to be back here early the coming week.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That disposes of that for the present.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I shall renew my motion, unless it is made clear to me that the Senator from North Dakota intends to return very early next week.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask what the motion is the Senator from Connecticut has made?

Mr. McLEAN. I shall move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. CUMMINS. Which will displace the unfinished business?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. McLEAN. I withhold the motion for the present.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall earnestly oppose any such motion.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from Connecticut has not made the motion as yet.

Mr. McLEAN. I withhold the motion for the present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1300) to authorize the sale of certain lands at or near Minidoka, Idaho, for railroad purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2497) to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relative of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa has asked for the reading of the bill, and the bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

TREATY OF PEACE AND WORK OF CONGRESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, speaking as one Member of this body, I am truly glad that so important a bill to the people of the United States as the railroad bill, known as the Cummins bill, has been laid before this body and read. If there ever was a time in the history of the country when the Senate of the United States ought to get down to business, it is at this time.

Mr. President, very few people like a "knocker." Neither do I, but I am going to make a few observations to-day that may, perhaps, be looked upon as leading in that direction. A year ago the 11th day of last November the armistice was declared, and all the world rejoiced at the prospect of immediate peace. What have we done in America to help realize that peace? What is the condition to-day? An entire session of Congress fooled away by the Republicans, who are in control of both Houses, and a few Democrats, trying to destroy the league of nations, which would have been the foundation for lasting peace in the world, as most people see it.

Conditions everywhere are worse than they were then; unrest and dissatisfaction on every hand; socialism, radicalism, and Bolshevism spreading throughout the land; our Government threatened on all sides; and more than a hundred million people impatiently waiting while a few men quarrel all summer in this body about the treaty.

The Republicans have done nothing—worse than nothing—since they came into power over six months ago. After wasting all summer, they forced an adjournment on this body, which will cost the country $225,000 for additional mileage. That is about the extent of the work that has been accomplished by this body—very little attempted—too busy playing politics and fighting President Wilson. And when this adjournment was forced in the middle of the night, among the reasons given to the leader on that side of the Chamber as to why we should adjourn, I am told, was that the hunting season was here and certain Senators wanted to go hunting, and as the report comes to me from a source that I consider perfectly reliable I have no doubt it is true. I do not suppose, Mr. President, the country cares very much about that one way or the other, save for the idle expenditure of $225,000, which the people must pay by taxation for additional mileage of the Senate and House. We have lived in an atmosphere of "do nothing" for six months past. We seem to like to talk to ourselves for publication in newspapers, and then do nothing until we talk some more, and then do nothing again. Indulgence in this habit has constituted a large part of our summer's work.

The constant warnings of approaching industrial trouble seem not to have concerned us. We have turned a deaf ear to their rumble, when they might have been averted. Republican leaders in this body have had only one thought—anything to discredit the President of the United States. This has been their prayer by day and their dream by night. All their energies have been exhausted in that direction. But they have failed. They have not deceived the people, and can not deceive them. The same spirit is now shown in their public criticism of the last message of the President, and if the thermometer of public opinion, as to the real worth of this Senate, goes down as fast in the minds of the public in the next six months as it has in the past six, it will not be long, I fear, before this body of the Government will be discontinued. The public believes, and in my opinion with good reason, that the day of real statesmanship has about gone by.

And now we are beginning to hear about the increase of salaries. Mr. President, there is not a Senator here, if you measure his worth by what he has done for his country in the last six months, who has earned half of what he now gets.

We have been riding straight toward trouble, as a country, for the past year, costing the people millions upon millions by our extravagance, setting the people of our land the worst possible example, preaching economy and practicing waste in our acts, taxing the people to pay for our waste of time, and giving them nothing in return. Do you expect a reasonable people to stand this always? Are we trying to help along the aggravated condition that exists in America to-day?

Mr. President, if we really want to serve our people, no greater field of opportunity was ever offered to a Congress of the United States than at this critical time in our country's life, when all the evils of destruction are at work, thundering at our very doors. Many dangers confront us, but the greatest of all, as I see it, is the failure to ratify the treaty of peace and covenant for a league of nations; and next, the high cost of living. This is driving honest men into the camp of the trouble makers. Will we not see these things before it is too late? Let us see what can be done, and do it at once, for when this is done, the foundation is then laid for the cure of most of our internal troubles, and the way is paved for a remedy for most of our unrest and disturbances. And so, if you ask me what should be done to settle the unrest now prevailing throughout the country, my answer is, first, ratify the treaty, so that all industries and the business of the country may know what to expect, and then take up this high cost of living problem and take it up in earnest. The accomplishment of these two tasks will bring satisfaction to our country again.

Mr. President, the Government's expense and the Nation's loss in waiting for the ratification of the treaty and league is millions of dollars every day, not to mention the loss to the world of thousands of lives. Half-formed governments in Europe are gradually yielding to those who oppose good government, and they will no doubt be soon overthrown unless some action is taken; and I have never seen a time in my life when the condition of our own country was as dangerous as it is to-day. Extravagance, waste, and inactivity characterize the conduct of the Congress of the United States, notwithstanding these conditions. Our people are being held up month after month by the quarrels of a few men in the Senate. The high cost of living is laying its hands heavily upon all mankind. Winter is upon us again with a shortage of coal necessary to warm our homes, accompanied by much other suffering which cold weather always brings. These conditions only help to aggravate the general situation that exists.

Mr. President, by our refusal to ratify the treaty of peace and league covenant, we are showing the worst kind of bad faith with our late allies and associates. By not taking immediate action on this all-important matter we are helping to destroy most of the new States set up in Europe and recognized at Versailles. The new States of Poland, Czechoslovakia, and others, will soon fall a prey to German ambition without this league. Each day's delay helps to destroy them, and to destroy our prestige in all Europe, and to bring about a condition which will cost us dearly in our own land. We are sowing to-day; we will reap to-morrow. As surely as this country lives to-day, it will have to pay the price of its foolishness. The pendulum of eternal justice will some time swing back to its center, and then we will see our mistakes and pay the penalty for them. I hope I may be pardoned when I say that my idea is that we all feel the importance of our position more than we do its responsibilities for the public good. I wish to add that when you are fighting the principles and ideas of President Wilson, as outlined in the league of nations covenant, you are fighting the ideas and principles of the American people. Our action during the session of Congress just closed will need to be gone over again before the business of the country will settle down to normal conditions. We have repeatedly insulted every civilized nation on earth. We have closed the door to our friends and opened it to our enemies. And if we do not change the situation in some way, I will not be surprised to see the Governments of every English-speaking people in the world destroyed in the next 20 years.

This country must do one of two things—either ratify the treaty of peace and covenant of the league of nations in some form acceptable to all nations or enter at once upon the construction of the largest Navy the world has ever seen. No other course is left for us; no other course could be considered by any sensible man.

Have you read the published reports of the refusal of Germany to sign the treaty protocol? Does that have any significance for you? The latter remark I respectfully address to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

In connection with what I have to say, Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter written on this subject by one of the most prominent men in the State of South Dakota, a former Republican Senator in this body, the Hon. Coe I. Crawford, a man whom no doubt the majority of Senators here know. I ask that that letter, which was printed in the Sioux City (Iowa) Tribune on November 25, be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HURON, S. DAK., November 23, 1919.

EDITOR SIOUX CITY TRIBUNE.

DEAR SIR: If the attitude of the Republican Party is truly represented by the spirit of insane hostility and partisanship which became manifest even before the treaty of peace with Germany was laid before the Senate by the President, and has grown in bitterness and intensity from that time until the vote for ratification was taken the other day, and in which impartial and judicial consideration of the treaty seems to have been lost in the desire to rebuke, humiliate, and defeat the President out of revenge for slights, or for personal reasons and partisanship; if that attitude is to receive the support of the National Republican organization, then, upon that issue, I can not support that party. I am a Republican; but I shall refuse to follow my party in opposition to this world-wide attempt to restrain future wars by a great cooperative league of nations to promote and enforce peace. I never was a politician and am permanently out of political activities. What I may say or do is of no consequence. But, upon a subject so momentous, every citizen of the country, no matter what his station, may be pardoned for expressing his conviction that those who have defeated the ratification of this treaty have committed a crime against civilization equal in enormity to the crime of war.

COE I. CRAWFORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, let me say just a few words about the profiteers. There is not anyone who questioned the power of Congress to pass the prohibition act, which destroyed millions and millions of dollars' worth of property in our country. There is not anyone who questioned the authority of Congress to pass the woman suffrage amendment. There is not anyone who questioned the authority of the banks of the country to limit the profits on money loaned. Then on what ground is the authority of Congress to limit the percentage of profits on the necessities of life questioned, I should like to know?

We should realize the immediate necessity of formulating some plan likely to bring relief. The people look to Congress to do this. They think we can do it. And if, after a real effort, Congress finds it can not give relief, it owes it to the people to frankly tell them so, and tell them at once.

My own idea as to our power to do this is that the people must do their share. They must realize that they live in a dangerous age; that they themselves have helped to bring this condition upon the country by their reckless extravagances; and that they must give more thought to the things that make real men and women and less attention to the things which are foolish and hurtful. Then, with the help of the people in that way, Congress will be able, no doubt, to do its share. But all must work together.

While I am on this subject let me also call your attention to the measures already introduced in Congress looking to the control of the great packers' combine, especially the Kenyon bill. To give an idea of the magnitude of this combination, the report of the Federal Trade Commission on the meat-packing industry dis-closes to us the startling information that the list of commodities manufactured or distributed by them comprise about 630 articles—mostly necessaries and largely food products. We are informed in the same report that the history of the conspiracy of this combination was first investigated in the year 1890. After two years of investigation the Senate committee reported unanimously that there was an agreement between the then leading packers to restrain competition; that there was collusion with regard to fixing of prices and division of territory and business. This combination has been growing in strength and size since that time, a period of over 29 years, until to-day it is controlling about everything of commercial value used by the people. Do you wonder that there is unrest among the people? Curb the packers, and you will help to heal it and to lay the foundation for a lasting government at home.

We have men in this Chamber who have been fighting that combination and other combinations for the last quarter of a century. We have fought them consistently in season and out of season, and yet we are reminded to-day that they have grown stronger and stronger and greater and greater, until we find this condition existing, that they still control 630 varieties of necessary commodities. Let us assist these men and help hold up their hands, to continue their fight to a successful conclusion.

Mr. President, in April, 1917, when we had up the conscription or selective-service act I said on this floor, and time has only convinced me that I was right, that I was opposed to placing any age limit on conscription, but that I would conscript every male citizen in the United States, so that all might be called on to serve their country in some capacity, if necessary, during the war. I had then in mind just such combines as that of the great packers. That would have applied to the entire business of the country as well. Then a percentage basis might have been placed on the profits of those who had the necessaries of life to sell and profiteering would have been more easily handled. The condition of the country would have been much better than it is to-day; and, with conditions as they are now in our country, I would like to see the plan put into operation and continue until we get on our feet once more. Something must be done, and done at once, to curb the profiteers, or they will be the means of actually destroying our country.

Let me also call your attention to the fact that for the first time in the history of the United States bolshevism has openly asked to be recognized. The Government has been asked to capitulate in favor of the few against the many. The union laborers of the country are getting away from their organization leaders and it will not be long until the more radical element of these organizations will control them. The people of the United States are rapidly losing faith in their Congress because of its dilly-dally tactics in legislation to meet the needs of the country at this critical time. We have failed to perform or enter upon any definite policy of reconstruction—that which is most necessary to any country after a great war in the change from war to peace. We have in some instances hindered the progress of legislation. At the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress the country was held up on important measures, thus adding to the unrest. The same spirit was shown in the session just closed.

These delays of Congress upon important matters are encouraging strikers; they encourage the profiteers and the spirit of Bolshevism both in the United States and in Europe. They help to discourage moral force in Europe among our allies, but, more than all, they encourage the great unrest in our own country.

We hear a great deal nowadays about compulsory military training. Speaking for myself, I have never been able to reach a conclusion on the policy which should be pursued. But I think one of the greatest needs of the country at the present time is to inaugurate a system along the same lines providing for compulsory labor, affecting all persons between certain proper ages, including the millionaire as well as the poor man. This would do more to stimulate production and settle the question than anything else I know of, and at the same time prevent half the crime in the country. It would do away with idleness, which is always a cause of unrest. What we need is more work and less idleness, and in Congress more work and less talk.

We have encouraged the system of "do as little as you can, and get as much pay as you can," until it has spread over the entire length and breadth of the Nation. Shorter hours and higher wages has been the slogan, until to-day it takes two men to do the work of one with wages twice as high to each individual. Our Government will never be placed on a solid foundation again until this system is changed. This wheel will go around until all of the spokes are lost, and every day will be Saturday afternoon for everybody.

We have taken too many people away from producing and have made consumers of them. We have reached the time when the food supply of the world is not sufficient to feed its hungry people. All must be fed, if we are to exist. We have destroyed in the past five years what it has taken a century to upbuild. Real work of some kind will solve the vital problem which the world faces to-day, and only work can, and any man who will not work and help to recreate the things that have been destroyed—not only the material things but the moral things—is a slacker in the world's great battle which is now upon us.

I want the people to get the picture squarely in mind, and to realize that in our industrial trouble lies our immediate danger to-day. The high cost of living is one of the things upon which all our labor troubles rest, and hence one of the things to which we should give our greatest study. The soldier's responsibility on the battle field was not greater than the responsibility of every man now in the great national battle for reconstruction, so that we may live and enjoy in peace the fruits of the victory won by our boys under the colors across the seas and in our own land.

But, Mr. President, let us not forget the practical maxim that as long as selfishness exists it will be impossible to please all. There is a selfishness of capital and a selfishness of labor, and both in essence are the same. We can not cater to one without justly offending the other, and I hope there is a prevailing sentiment in this body that desires to be just and fair to both. Capital has been charged in the past with being tyrannical, and I believe it true. The charge is now being repeated from a hundred labor camps. And the countercharge that labor is likewise now adopting the tactics of tyranny is also heard everywhere. The time will never come when the public mind will be at rest. Agitation is one of the conditions of progress, and there is, of course, such a thing as healthful unrest, but not such as we have to-day. We are in for a long period of agitation, which I hope will result in ultimate good. Labor and capital are now antagonistic, and the public—the most legitimately interested group of all—is the greatest sufferer. I am glad to note that this fact is being recognized. The present movement of the Government in the pending coal strike is in the direct interest of the people. It is really something new in the handling of disturbances between capital and labor.

But, I am moved to ask, what is likely to be the result of the public's entry into the arena? My conviction is that if we are in earnest in our efforts to secure an adjustment in the public interest it will not be long until we see signs of the formation of a copartnership between labor and capital. I point it out as, in my opinion, one of the certainties of the future. I call your attention also to the fact that this alliance when it comes will be a powerful one, and we will do well to make our plans to meet it; and the public will do well to try the plan of being represented here by more men devoted to the country itself and by fewer who are chosen by the special interests. I might easily enlarge upon this, but it is a question for the future. I do not think we have ever entered upon an era calling for greater gifts of patriotic statesmanship than now. For myself, I can not tolerate threats against law and our national integrity. Just now labor seems to be influenced by bolshevistic propagandists—I refer to organized labor—and though I hope it will quickly come to its senses, it seems to me that the loyal element in its ranks should not have been led into the quagmire in which it now flounders. It must take an early stand for loyalty or it will have lost all the ground it has gained in the quarter century past. No one liked the position taken by labor in refusing to confer in an attempt to adjust real differences and in ignoring the public appeal made by the President of the United States. It is because of the public faith in its loyalty that public criticism has been directed only to its leaders, though I abate nothing from my view of the future.

In this connection I wish to say that in the pending trouble with reference to the soft-coal situation the Government has no quarrel with the coal miners. On the contrary, its sympathies are with them. They are a part of the Government equally with all other men. But the Government's anxiety is for the people who must be warmed, fed, and clothed. For that reason it was thought the action already taken was necessary. I also wish to express my approval of what was said a short time ago by ex-Secretary McAdoo, which appeared in the press. I regard his utterance as exceedingly timely, containing information which should be spread abroad among the people, and also containing suggestions which should be followed. If the profits of the coal operators are as stated to have been within his official knowledge, it seems to me that the path of duty for us, both on behalf of the people and the miners, is plainly indicated. And I wish to add, further, that I am strongly of the opinion that if the treaty with Germany had been ratified with promptness some months ago this labor crisis would not have been upon us. I believe this, Mr. President, because at the end of hostilities there was opened up the greatest possibilities of commercial activity ever known in the country. Business, seeing this prospect, halted because of uncertainty, while the debate went on. Markets invited, the demand for labor was never more insistent, its rewards were never greater, and America had its opportunity to feed and clothe the hungry and naked of the world. But we lost our chance. We were still at war. Everything was delayed. Had the wheels of industry and commerce been set in motion, we would have had a labor population too busy and satisfied to act as they have done.

Now, Mr. President, one of the most important matters to come before us at this session of Congress is the railroad bill, which has for its purpose the turning back of the transportation systems of the country to their owners. This bill will no doubt take considerable of the time of Congress, and is of great importance to the country. My hope is that it may be given our most careful consideration. The Senate Interstate Commerce Committee has given the matter a great deal of time and attention in its preparation. Their report on what is known as the Cummins bill was made to us unanimously, which leads one to conclude that it was very thoroughly gone over.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I think there was a minority report submitted by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I am very glad to be corrected. I was informed that the report was the unanimous report of the committee, and I am very glad the Senator from Utah has corrected me.

The late war has brought upon us a debt which this generation will not be able to pay. It is a mortgage upon the entire property of all the people of the United States, and the only way it can be paid is by strict economy and prudence in handling the business of the Government from now on. Each Member of Congress should recognize this fact and be anxious to do his part in the great struggle which is now upon us. We should cut off millions of dollars of useless and worthless expenses in running the Government, which are apparent to any ordinary observer in Washington.

Mr. President, if I were chairman of the committee that had in charge the economical running of this Government, the first thing I would do would be to commence to clean house at home. The Capital of the United States is literally filled with men occupying positions and drawing salaries from the Government who are absolutely useless. The parks and the grounds are filled with policemen who are only seen occasionally. In most of the departments of our Government the clerks are so numerous that they are actually in each other's way. There are tons upon tons of worthless useless printing done at the Government Printing Office.

I would stop the collection and free distribution of seeds. I would stop the franking privilege of every Senator and Representative on everything that was not absolutely necessary to the public business.

The Civil Service Commission costs our country millions and millions of dollars every year, and so far as I know it is of very little practical use to the country.

I would abolish the office of the Register of the Treasury, as being an obsolete, antiquated, useless part of this Government. Last but not least, I would abolish the Indian Bureau of the United States, which costs this Government from $10,000,000 to $25,000,000 every year. Since I have been here the Congress of the United States has passed appropriations taking millions and millions of dollars from the Treasury of the United States and from the Indian funds, ostensibly for the benefit of the Indians, but in reality for no other purpose than to keep 6,000 or 7,000 employees in office. Such appropriations have not benefited the Indians. I live in an Indian section; I can speak the tongue of the Indians; and if I have good common sense I know what is of benefit to the Indians and what is not. I would eliminate from this Government such institutions and such branches and cease the appropriation of millions and millions of dollars that are now being made and expended for useless, worthless, no-account things. I repeat I would commence cleaning house at home. I would conduct a campaign of economy and see if for once the Government could not be run for somewhere near the same sum of money which the ordinary business man would expend if he were carrying on a business of like extent.

We have heard much criticism for the last three or four years of the expense of running the Government, and it has been just criticism; for if we continue to run the Government as it has been run there is only one thing which may be expected, and that is, with the future appropriations which will be absolutely necessary for the payment of pensions and other objects which are important and right, together with all of these idle and useless expenses, the Government will break down and fail in its usefulness to the American people. I do not recall, however, that a Senator standing on this floor and speaking on the subject of the expenses of the Government has pointed out any specific remedy for the present situation. I now point these things out because I believe they ought to be pointed out, and so long as I stay here I shall continue to do so.

Three years ago, Mr. President, I introduced a resolution in this body giving the President the power to segregate items of appropriation and to approve those which were desirable, at the same time eliminating objectionable features which appropriation bills might contain, thereby attaining in some degree the results which would flow from the adoption of a budget system. That resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, where, so far as I know, it still sleeps. Because some system of that kind has not been adopted, the result has been that we have been drifting straight along in the direction I have indicated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I desire to call the Senator's attention to one matter which, doubtless, has come under his observation. The executive agencies and departments and instrumentalities of the Government have become so powerful that they practically defy and flout the legislative branch of the Government. Heads of bureaus and departments and subordinates of every character denounce Congress—the Senate and the House—and every effort which is made in the direction of economy with respect to the departments and agencies to which I have just referred.

Why, even a Cabinet officer recently quite bitterly attacked a Senator in his own town because the Senator, in the discharge of his duty, had attempted to pare down some of the excrescences that were found upon an appropriation bill for that department. It has become so now that the executive departments are organized, in a way, for the purpose of coercing Congress into the passage of just such acts as the executive departments and the executive officials want. Congress is ceasing to function and is becoming the mere rubber stamp of departments, bureaus, and officials of the Government.

The fault with many of these gross extravagances rests with Senators—and, of course, I shall not say the House of Representatives, for that would, perhaps, be a violation of the rules. It rests with us. We do not pare these bills down and scrutinize them as we should; we do not place the executive officials in the position where they ought to be placed; we do not legislate; but we register the wishes of those who are trying to get their hands into the Public Treasury. It is time that we should reform the method of legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, what the Senator from Utah has said is entirely true. The heads of the departments make estimates, but that does not excuse Congress for permitting those estimates to go through in the shape of appropriations. There is no use for us, as the Senate of the United States, to stand here and condemn the departments when we do everything they ask us to do. I have never yet seen the time, since I have been here, when if there was an appropriation proposed for some useless thing it did not go through. Of course, we pass appropriation bills of that character, and so long as we do it we are to blame.

Mr. President, we can not recall our record of the past, but surely we can avoid similar errors in the future. Speaking for myself, I am here, anxious, willing, and ready to devote all my time—8, 10, or 12 hours a day, regardless of my own comfort—to help as best I can to solve the great questions that confront us at this critical time. To anyone, from any quarter, I stand ready to give the best that is in me to help maintain and perpetuate our government of law and order, given us by our forefathers and the statesmen of days gone by.

Mr. President, no one will accuse me of saying this because of political aspirations. I appreciate more than I can express the great honor the people of my State bestowed on me in sending me here to represent them for the six years of my service, which will be concluded on March 4, 1921. I shall continue to serve them until that time to the best of my ability without any thought or desire to be returned here, but I hope with a consciousness in my own mind, at least, of having done my duty as I have seen it.

Mr. President, I have mentioned some matters connected with our past policy in this body, because I believe them to be unfair. I complain because I believe I speak for the people when I do so. They can not speak for themselves, or at least their voice can not penetrate this Chamber. The treaty is not settled, the labor question is not settled, the grave problems of reconstruction are upon us, and there is no time to lose. The people demand that Congress act with promptness and decision, and criticism of delay and inactivity is widespread and just. I believe there is a genuine public appeal and demand for less politics and more devotion to the serious duties that confront us. That is what my people in South Dakota want, and I speak for them especially. It is time for a show-down. Let us have it.

I hope my colleagues in this body will take what I have said in the same spirit in which I have intended it, for I think a great deal of them; but I think more of the welfare of the 800,000 people of the splendid young State of South Dakota whom I have the honor in part to represent.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 5, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Let thy spirit, Eeternal God, our Heavenly Father, possess our souls. Remove all petty desires, selfish ambitions, that we may concentrate our minds upon the eternal verities and meet the obligations Thou hast laid upon us, to the good of our Republic.

Eliminate all wrongs, increase the just rights of every citizen throughout the land, that peace, harmony, brotherly love may obtain and thus reflect glory upon Thee. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3427. An act to establish a commission to report to Congress on the practicability, feasibility, and place, and to devise plans for the construction of a public bridge over the Niagara River from some point in the city of Buffalo, N. Y., to some point in the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

SALE OF CERTAIN LANDS NEAR MINIDOKA, IDAHO.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 1300, an act to authorize the sale of certain lands at or near Minidoka, Idaho, for railroad purposes, and put it on its passage, a similar bill, H. R. 2945, almost in identical language, having already passed the House.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, can we have the bill reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the Senate bill 1300, an act to authorize the sale of certain lands at or near Minidoka, Idaho, for railroad purposes, may now be taken up for consideration, a similar House bill having already passed the House. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the bill about?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, it is a bill to authorize the sale of 67 acres of land to the Oregon Short Line Railroad Co. at Minidoka, a junction point, on which the company desires to build a roundhouse and switches.

Mr. GARD. The bill has already passed the House?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The bill passed the House a month ago, and the Senate inadvertently passed a similar Senate bill, instead of passing the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell and convey to Oregon Short Line Railroad Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Utah and authorized to do business in the State of Idaho, its successors and assigns, for railroad purposes, and at a price to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior in order to return the expenditure heretofore made or proposed for the irrigation of the lands at not less than $50 per acre, and under such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, the following-described land, situated in Minidoka County, Idaho:

All that part of the west half of the southeast quarter and the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 2, and the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter and the north half of the northwest quarter of section 11, all in township 8 south, range 25 east of the Boise meridian, within the following-described area:

Beginning at the intersection of the present southeasterly right of way boundary of the Twin Falls Branch of the Oregon Short Line Railroad Co. with the section line common to said sections 2 and 11, 100 feet southeasterly from and at right angles to the center line of main track of said railroad, said intersection also bearing north 89° 5′ west, 460.1 feet from the quarter section corner common to said sections 2 and 11; thence north 40° 25′ east along said southeasterly right of way boundary, being 100 feet southeasterly from and parallel to said center line of main track, for a distance of 1,726.8 feet; thence south 0° 1′ east, and parallel to the north and south center line of said section 2, for a distance of 1,332.6 feet, to a point in the section line common to said sections 2 and 11; thence continuing south 0° 1′ east, and parallel to the north and south center line of said section 11, for a distance of 1,320 feet, to the south line of the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter and the north half of the northwest quarter of said section 11; thence north 89° 5′ west, along said south line, for a distance of 2,229.5 feet, to a point in the present southeasterly right of way boundary of said railroad; thence north 40° 25′ east, along said right of way boundary, and being 100 feet southeasterly from and parallel to said center line of main track, for a distance of 1,710.4 feet, to the point of beginning, and containing in all 67.87 acres, more or less, within the proposed pumping unit of the Minidoka project of the United States Reclamation Service.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the matter now pending before the House?

The SPEAKER. The House has given unanimous consent for the consideration of the Senate bill 1300.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Without having it read?

The SPEAKER. It has been read.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It was not read before unanimous consent was given. We could not hear what the Chair said. I did not know that unanimous consent had been given.

The SPEAKER. It was read by title before the consent was given.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, the bill provides for the sale of 67 acres of land to the Oregon Short Line Railroad Co. at Minidoka, a junction point, on which they desire to build tracks and a roundhouse. The bill passed the House about a month ago, and the Senate a few days later passed a similar bill, introduced in the Senate, and we are now considering the Senate bill, which has been on the Speaker's table for the last three weeks.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Why was it not referred to the committee so that it could come up in the regular way or put on the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Because a similar bill has already passed the House, and it was not deemed necessary to send the Senate bill to the committee, but it was held on the Speaker's table to come up under the rule.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But it is not coming up under any rule. There is no rule providing for its coming up in this way. The rules specifically provide for the contrary. The rules provide that this bill should be sent to the committee. I shall not object, since consent has been given for the consideration of the bill without the knowledge of the House, but it is mighty poor practice. There is a unanimous-consent day in the House, when bills of this sort should properly come before the House, so that Members may have notice. This bill does not come within the rule for two reasons: First, it is not a House Calendar bill, and, second, there is no bill on the calendar from the House committee.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. A similar bill has already passed the House.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But the rule provides that in such case Senate bills shall be sent to the committee and reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the bill being considered in the House instead of in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, out of curiosity, I want to know how this bill does come before the House, for I may want to use the same process myself in the future.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is a Senate bill and has been on the Speaker's table for some time, a similar bill having already passed the House and was pending in the Senate Committee on Public Lands, but through an inadvertance the Senate considered the Senate bill instead of the House bill.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman please tell me where he finds any rule that will permit this kind of procedure?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Under the rules of the House that a similar bill having been reported to the House it would be proper to call up the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. It was done by unanimous consent. Unanimous consent was given.

Mr. WINGO. I am not quibbling, but I want to know.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asked unanimous consent for its consideration and that unanimous consent was granted.

Mr. WINGO. And the Speaker holds that is a matter of discretion with the Speaker, if he desires to submit the request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so. The gentleman from Idaho now asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk again read the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Idaho, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BILLS ON THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, October 31, when the bills on the Private Calendar were before the House, there were a number of bills left over for third reading, and I would like to have them called up at the present time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman endeavoring to take up claims bills for consideration?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; this is the unfinished business.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I make the point of order that the House has adopted resolution 408 for the consideration of this grain standard package bill. It provides that after general debate the bill shall be read under the five-minute rule. That is a continuing order even though the rule does not specifically say so.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the rule not having made this bill a continuing order it would not be a continuing order. I make the point of order that the rule must provide that it be the continuing order of the House.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the rule provides that immediately upon the adoption of this rule the House shall resolve itself in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. That is the rule requiring the Speaker to declare the House is resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union upon the demand for the regular order, whenever the stage of unfinished business is reached in the House, after business on the Speaker's table is disposed of. That ruling was made first, I believe, by Speaker CANNON. It was made many times and acted upon many times by Speaker CLARK that the House having adopted a rule providing that it shall immediately consider a bill in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union it does not even require a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union without motion.

The SPEAKER. Can the gentleman cite the Chair to one of those precedents?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I can not cite the Chair to the RECORD where it contains the precedent, but I know the precedents have been so all the time, commencing years ago. The purpose of that was this, and it is perfectly simple, that when the House adopted a rule—often a partisan one, adopted as a party proposition—it was not then proposed to have the House take the time to vote upon the question whether it should resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, that having just been decided that they would resolve into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union it was not again to take up the time of the House where there was an effort for obstruction.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman from Illinois says as to precedents is entirely correct, but at the time the ruling was made by Speaker CANNON, followed by Speaker CLARK, it had been the custom to bring in rules without differentiating between a rule that made a bill a continuing order and a rule that made a bill in order. Beginning some time during the Sixty-fifth Congress the Committee on Rules adopted the policy of specifying in the rule whether or not a bill should be the continuing order under the rule, and during this Congress it has been the practice of the Committee on Rules in preparing a rule to ascertain whether or not it was desired or desirable that the bill in question should be made a continuing order.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If so, the rule so specifies; if not, the rule simply made the bill in order. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman has in mind, as he is the gentleman who has reported most of the rules, rules which read that it should be in order to move that the House go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, it having been held by the Chair in the Sixty-fifth Congress that this does not make the business a continuing order, but where the rule reads that upon the adoption of this rule the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I think invariably in the Sixty-fifth Congress, and I think the present Speaker has ruled early in the first session of this Congress, that it made the matter a continuing order.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The construction suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts is not the construction placed by the Committee on Rules upon the declaration in the rule that immediately upon the adoption of the rule the House should resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. That declaration in the rule has of late years been for the purpose of avoiding, perhaps, a roll call on a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The one motion adopting the rule would resolve the House into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union rather than to adopt the rule and then require the House to have another roll call or motion to go into the Committee of the Whole. As I say, the purpose of the House has been expressed in this Congress in the rule itself when it was the intention that the bill should be made a continuing order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the gentleman from Kansas upon reflection will see that his argument falls to the ground. There were times under the old rules of the House when it was decided that a rule was only for the day or only for a particular occasion. Now, here comes the form of a rule which says that the House shall immediately resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Kansas, with a good deal of authority as chairman of the Committee on Rules, says that it is not a continuing order because it does not so expressly state. Then the rule is dead if that is the case. That ends the consideration of that bill unless a new rule comes up. That is not all. Under the expression of the gentleman from Kansas if yesterday the House during the consideration of that bill in the Committee of the Whole House had risen, as it frequently does if an appropriation bill or something else came in, it could not go back into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union because the order would be defunct, having been exercised once under the gentleman's contention of not being a continuing order, and therefore it is dead. Now, that was not the intention of that form of rule. It has been frequently the case where the committee or the House went into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills of this sort, that the committee rose and automatically went back into committee from the House; where the next day the House automatically resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

If the gentleman's committee desires that a rule shall be only for the day, they ought to so state, but here they put it that the House shall consider this bill through the stage of the five-minute rule, and when they are through report back to the House, and this order continues until the bill is reported back to the House in some shape.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If this bill had been made an order on Tuesday instead of on Thursday, the House would not have considered the bill on Wednesday, would it?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know whether it would or not. I am not sure about that; but I think Speaker CLARK held—I am not sure what he held—that the rule providing for Calendar Wednesday shall not be set aside except by express vote of two-thirds of the Members, and a rule of this sort did not set it aside. I am not sure whether he held that or whether he held it was set aside and the two-thirds vote so presumed. I know the rule subject to that would not be in order to set aside Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The general rules of the House have set apart to-day for bills from the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The general rules have not set apart Fridays for the consideration of such bills. They made it in order to consider such bills on Friday, but an appropriation bill or revenue bill on to-day would have preference in making the motion.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If a motion were made. The House could decide whether to consider one or the other.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The House has passed a rule, and there is no escape from it.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. The chairman and members of the committee will understand that Calendar Wednesday stands in a very different relation to the business of that day than that which occurs upon the assignment of other days for particular purposes. There is no other place where it says that no business shall be in order except, as provided in paragraph 4, and so forth. Calendar Wednesday is an express exception to the general assignment of the business of the House.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Undoubtedly.

Mr. TOWNER. And, of course, what would occur with regard to the cessation of business on Tuesday evening, being confronted by Calendar Wednesday, would not be the rule in regard to any other days.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly not.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, the question that is before the House is not quite clear under the precedents. I think it is within the fact to say that the line of precedents and the line of reasoning supporting them would go to the extent of holding that in a case such as we have before us now it would be the duty of the Chair, upon the disposition of the morning business, to say that the House should resolve itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering a bill that has been reported by rule, making it especially in order. The report of the Committee on Rules to the House supersedes the general rules of the House in almost every case, and it would certainly, as the gentleman from Illinois has so well pointed out, be an exceedingly dangerous thing to say that a bill should not be a continuing order except when the report of the Committee on Rules so expressly stated. When we have determined that at a certain time the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering a bill, that of itself makes it a continuing order, unless it is superseded by some superior authority, and it seems to me that the rule for to-day could not be considered as such a superior authority.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it at all important, from the standpoint of the business of the House, whether we proceed with the consideration of the bill that was considered yesterday or take up the consideration of the Private Calendar. Eventually we will arrive at the same place. It is just a question of which class of business shall be first considered. But I can not agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], who has just spoken, or the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in their interpretation of the rule. If this rule makes this bill a continuing order as against anything and everything else, I am at a loss to know just what language the Committee on Rules could use to simply make a measure in order in the House.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman recall the language used in the rule making the railroad bill in order?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Why would not that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the two rules are not similar, and therefore the gentleman's reference to the railroad bill does not answer my query.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would not what the gentleman suggests be carried out by language in this rule that, instead of "upon the adoption it shall resolve itself," should say "it shall be in order to move"?

Mr. MONDELL. I was just coming to that.

What gentlemen are arguing is this: That because the rule, instead of providing that it should be in order to go into Committee of the Whole House on its adoption, it places the House in the Committee of the Whole; that therefore the rule and the authority that it gives are altogether changed and different from what they would be if the rule simply provided that a motion might be made to go into Committee of the Whole. Now, I can not agree with that. The Committee on Rules in adopting a rule of this sort intended to avoid the necessity of a vote on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, and that is all.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment.

It did not intend by using that language to give the rule any higher privilege or any greater potency than it otherwise would have, but, in my opinion, all it then did was to make this bill in order yesterday, which makes it the unfinished business for the future. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said there was no time when it could be taken up. It could be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. How?

Mr. MONDELL. It could come up to-morrow as unfinished business.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. How would it come up?

Mr. MONDELL. It would come up by a motion made by the gentleman in charge of the bill that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and take the bill up. And the fact that the rule provided that at the time the rule was adopted the House should go automatically into Committee of the Whole does not mean that thereafter, and for the entire session of Congress, if this bill should remain before the House, the House must always go automatically into Committee of the Whole the moment it met for the consideration of this bill, to the exclusion of appropriation bills and bills from the Committee on Ways and Means and all the other business of the House.

That is unthinkable. If the Committee on Rules intended to make this bill a continuing order to the exclusion of all other business, the committee would have used language indicating its intent. It had no such intent, as has been stated by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I understand the gentleman argues that the rule gave this bill priority just for one day.

Mr. MONDELL. No; not priority just for one day. The rule brought the bill before the House for consideration.

Mr. WINGO. Did it not go further?

Mr. MONDELL. Bills come before the House for consideration in a great variety of ways, but they are not necessarily made a continuing order. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] indicate how the Committee on Rules can bring a measure into the House without making it a continuing order if the simple language of this resolution makes it a continuing order?

Mr. WALSH. It can do so by bringing in a rule providing that on the adoption of this rule it shall be in order for the House to move to resolve itself. That puts it up to the chairman of the committee to make that motion or not. That is what has been done heretofore.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it strikes me as a very strained construction of that language to say that language, the only intent of which was to avoid a possible roll call, entirely changes the character of a rule and invests it with a dignity and potency and effect that it would not otherwise have. If that is true, then how can the Committee on Rules make a provision for going into Committee of the Whole without by so doing making a bill a continuing order?

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman give me a citation of the authority that he finds in this rule for anybody to make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole after the House has once gone into the Committee of the Whole automatically?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I do not think it is at all necessary in the adoption of a rule to have any provision in the rule under which various motions may be made. I do not think that is essential. But, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the matter is important. Depending upon what the decision of the Chair may be, the Committee on Rules will govern itself accordingly in the future; and so far as the business of the House is concerned, I think it is entirely immaterial whether we take up the Vestal bill to-day or go to the Private Calendar. But I am sure that the Committee on Rules had no thought of making this a continuing order, particularly a continuing order under which the House must automatically take it up every time it meets.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to cite to the Speaker section 3201 and the following section, Volume IV of Hinds' Precedents, which would seem to indicate that before a regular day set apart by the rules of the House for the consideration of business is to be eliminated by a rule there must be some particular language in the rule eliminating that day.

Now, section 3202 shows that Mr. Reed, of Maine, made a point of order that the consideration of the bill then in question was not in order, the day being Friday and set apart under the rules of the House for the consideration of private business. The Speaker overruled Mr. Reed, but he overruled him because the special order made the bill a special order "to continue from day to day until finally acted on."

Now, that shows that the rule contained specific language eliminating Friday from the regular business to which that day was devoted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. This rule is not entirely explicit, and perhaps the Chair could rule either way; but the Chair is disposed to think that, in order to have an unbroken line of precedents and in order to make easier the task of the committee in the future in drawing rules, it would be wisest to hold that this rule does order that the House automatically go into Committee of the Whole.

If the Committee on Rules desires to make a bill privileged, it is easy to state that it shall be in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole, and that would always allow the House to exercise its will, because, particularly in the case of a bill which is likely to take up time, it is important that the House should each day have an opportunity to set it temporarily aside and not be obliged automatically to go into committee when there is other business it might desire to dispose of first.

Moreover, the Chair is troubled with the question which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] asked—that if the Chair should hold that we did not automatically go into Committee of the Whole, inasmuch as the previous question has not been ordered on the bill and it is not unfinished business, just what claim would the bill have for consideration. The Chair would probably rule as he has before, that it was the intention, as was stated by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], to give it that privilege.

But the Chair finds a precedent back in 1894 holding that on just such a resolution as this the House does automatically go into Committee of the Whole, and the Chair is informed and thinks he remembers, although no precedents have been cited, that under the administrations of Speaker CLARK and of Speaker CANNON that precedent was followed. So the Chair rules that the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole under the rule, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] will take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9755, with Mr. HICKS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House having automatically resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9755, the Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9755) to establish the standard of weights and measures for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Is there any amendment to section 1 now pending for action by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that last night, immediately before the committee rose, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] offered an amendment to the section. A divisional vote being asked for and taken, the lack of a quorum was disclosed, whereupon the gentleman from Arkansas made the point of order that no quorum was present; thereupon the committee rose. Under Rule XXIII, section 8, it provides that "the rules of proceeding in the House shall be observed in Committee of the Whole so far as they may be applicable."

Paragraph 503, Jefferson's Manual, provides that "when from counting the House on a division it appears that there is not a quorum, the matter continues exactly in the state in which it was before the division and must be resumed at that point at any future day." Were it necessary to further fortify the Chair's ruling, he would refer to volume 4 of Hines, paragraph 2974, where in a similar case it was decided that the vote was made invalid on the establishment of a point of no quorum. The Chair rules that the vote now comes upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the amendment be now reported. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO: Page 2, line 2, after the word "pounds," strike out the remainder of section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the section.

Mr. GARD. I have several perfecting amendments, which, probably, should be considered first.

Mr. BLANTON. They should be considered first, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Texas withhold his amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. I withhold my amendment pending the consideration of the perfecting amendments.

Mr. GARD. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 2, line 3, after the word "only," insert "in packages of."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this amendment, which, to my mind makes the language clear. The language now reads:

And in addition, but for commercial feeding stuffs only, 60, 70, or 80 pounds.

The amendment I offer is to make the language more clear and the intention more clear by inserting the words "in packages of," before the words "60, 70, or 80 pounds."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Surely.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The bill provides that these articles shall be in packages containing net avoirdupois weight 100 pounds, or a multiple of 100 pounds, or certain fractions thereof, but it is all in packages. Now, if the gentleman inserts the words "in packages of" where he proposes, would not the inference be that the former part of the bill providing for 100 pounds and multiples of 100 pounds and fractions of 100 pounds did not apply to commercial feedstuffs, because the word "packages" is inserted a second time?

Mr. GARD. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It seems to me that would be the inference, because if you find it necessary to insert the word "packages" the second time the word "packages" the first time does not apply, or else you would not insert it the second time.

Mr. GARD. I am very glad to have the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In line 9, page 1, it is provided that these articles must be in a package containing 100 pounds, or a multiple of 100 pounds, or certain fractions thereof. Then, in addition, in certain cases it is provided that it may be 60, 70, or 80 pounds. But if you insert the word "package" there it seems to me you indicate that it does not relate to the term "a package" on the first page.

Mr. GARD. I do not see how there can be any separation of the ideas. My amendment is simply to clarify and make certain the language. If the committee think it is unnecessary I withdraw the amendment and offer another one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 2, line 3, after the word "pounds" strike out the period and insert a comma and the following language: "and each of which packages shall bear a plain, legible, and conspicuous statement of the net weight contained therein."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered so that the buyer of these packages, whether they be food packages or whether they be feed packages, will be entitled to knowledge, to be contained in a plain, legible, and conspicuous statement, of the net weight contained therein.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. Inasmuch as the act provides a penalty for failure to insert the prescribed net weight, is it not to be presumed that it will contain it, and therefore that the extra trouble and expense of requiring the seller to put the statement on the package may be unnecessary?

Mr. GARD. No; I think by all means it should be stated on the package. I think if we are to get any benefit from this bill reported by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, the packages submitted for sale should actually bear upon their faces a statement of the true net weight of the contents.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am informed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] that in his opinion commercial feedstuffs are not covered by the pure-food law. I was under the impression that they were.

Mr. GARD. No; I do not think they are.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The net weight of packages is required to be stated on all articles covered by the pure-food law. The enforcement of that law, of course, is in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. GARD. This is a different proposition, to be enforced by the Bureau of Standards, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GARD. And it seems to me that the same rule should apply, that the consumer should have the benefit of knowing what is the actual net weight of the contents of the package he buys.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman about that proposition.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. How does the gentleman read section 3 in this connection? Will this be in conflict with the supplementary legislation contained in section 3?

Mr. GARD. No; it will not. I will say that the reason I offered the other amendment is that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] yesterday said he had been in communication with the Agricultural Department, and he intended to offer an amendment which would strike out some language in section 2, after the word "hereof," in lines 20, 21, and 22, and including the word "therein." So that it would in effect be a transposition, except that it would make it entirely sure in the first paragraph, which fixes the standard of packages. It would make it entirely sure that the man buying flour, hominy, grits, or meal in small packages—and the great bulk of the purchases in this country are in small packages, since they have no room for storage—it would make sure that the buyer of the package was buying honest weight.

Mr. VESTAL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. VESTAL. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that at the time I made the statement yesterday I was misinformed as to the provisions of the pure-food law taking care of commercial feedstuff, and so the amendment I stated yesterday I would offer I shall not offer. I have no objection to this amendment, for I do not think it hurts anything.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I think everybody else will be opposed to the amendment if they stop long enough to read the bill fully and see what you are going to do. This amendment will go to the matters on page 1 so far as the classification of what you are doing. You cover the packing, you cover the shipping, you cover the selling and the offering for sale. To come within the provisions of this bill you do not have to offer it for sale. If a farmer packs his feedstuff for his own use, if he packs it, he is subject to the provisions of the bill. Now, you do not intend to do that, but that is what you are doing. There is not a man on the floor who will sit down and read carefully who will doubt that you are covering the packing, you are covering the shipping, you are covering the selling, you are covering the offering for sale. You use the alternative "or" and not the conjunctive "and." It is beautifully written, but if you add on this amendment what happens? The farmer can not actually pack his own feedstuff, grown on his own farm, worked up in his own mill, unless he puts it up in packages and marks it as indicated. The American Congress has come to a wonderful pass when it enacts such legislation as this. It is bad enough as it is, but this would make it worse. I am going to offer later an amendment knocking out the packing and the shipping.

There can be some argument to control the sale of stuff for public use to different people throughout the country, but in the name of high heaven, what public good can be subserved, how can the health of this country be subserved, how can the people be protected against fraud, to say that a man must pack his stuff in a certain way, although he is to use it himself? That is what you do in the bill. This bill is like the ways of God, it passes all understanding, and the more you study it the worse mess it is.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. In lines 7 and 8 it says "when the same are packed, shipped, sold, or offered for sale in packages."

Mr. WINGO. That is it, "packed, shipped, sold, or offered for sale"—not "and" but "or."

Mr. CANNON. And would not the law only apply in the event that it is packed for sale?

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman think that?

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me so. If it is not so I am against it.

Mr. WINGO. Is there any lawyer in the House will say, where the word "or" is used instead of "and," that it does not mean that every one of the separate substantive propositions would be an offense, and he would not have to sell it?

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is not there an additional difficulty in the way of the interpretation proposed by the gentleman from Illinois? The word "sold" comes in there, and if his interpretation is correct it would mean, if written out in full, "packed" for sale, "shipped" for sale, "sold" for sale, and "offered" for sale.

Mr. WINGO. I am not making any criticism of the gentleman from Illinois. Even an old experienced legislator as he is will get the headache when he comes to try to analyze this bill. [Laughter.] It is like the famous snake railroad, which wriggled in and wriggled out and left the people all in doubt whether in its zigzag track it was going east or coming back.

My object was to call the attention of gentlemen to what we are trying to do. I am unable to find that what you want to do is not covered by the pure-food law. But you say if you pack it, ship it, or sell it you have got to do it in a certain way, put it up in a certain kind of a package. Why not go the whole length and describe the color of the package?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That might be well, so that the gentleman could recognize it.

Mr. WINGO. No; I am color blind; and if many more bills are introduced like this it will be enough to make any legislator legally blind.

The idea of saying that if you pack it or ship it or sell it you must put it in a certain kind of package! Why do you not provide that you must have red ribbons on it or a piece of cardboard? Why do not you require that it shall have a verse upon it? It would protect the public health and the people against fraud just as much as this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARD) there were—ayes 30, noes 7.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLANTON: Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "flours."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment merely as a pro forma one for the purpose of enabling me to call attention to the statement made yesterday concerning this bill by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. Flour now, as it is sold throughout the country, is put up in packages of 3 pounds, 6 pounds, 12 pounds, 24 pounds, and 48 pounds. The gentleman from Iowa said that there was a reason for changing this system to packages, where it was under 100 pounds, of 5 pounds, 10 pounds, 25 pounds, and 50 pounds, so that the customer could easily ascertain on buying the flour whether or not he was getting the full amount for which he was paying. In other words, the gentleman from Iowa would have us believe that a purchaser in going into a store could better tell whether a sack of flour presumed to contain 50 pounds did actually contain 50 pounds than he could tell whether or not a sack of flour presumed to contain 48 pounds actually contained 48 pounds. His argument, it seems to me, is ridiculous. The people of the country know now that when they buy flour generally known as a quarter of a barrel, they are presumed to get 48 pounds. How on earth could they better tell they are getting 50 pounds in a 50-pound sack than they are able now to tell whether they are getting 48 pounds in a 48-pound sack, and so on down the line with the smaller sacks? I do not see how this particular bill helps the situation at all.

With regard to wheat and corn, every business man knows that with respect to every bushel of these crops the manufacturers of sacks have already made their arrangements to handle the entire crops, so far as sacks are concerned. The sacks are either manufactured or are now in the process of manufacture. We know that upon these sacks each mill places its distinct printed label, which costs much money. Not only is this true with respect to flour, but it is likewise true with respect to meal and corn products of all kinds. There is an apparent distinction made in the bill with regard to corn products as distinguished from wheat products. In other words, in section 8 of the bill it is provided that the act shall not take effect so far as corn products are concerned until 90 days after its passage, but with respect to wheat flour and wheat products it is to take effect 12 months after its passage. So far as the corn crop is concerned, so far as the corn-meal sacks and the corn-products containers—the hominy containers and the grits containers—all of which are corn products——

Mr. LAYTON rose.

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. I was wondering whether the gentleman from Texas has looked at section 8 of the bill. Does he not think that that provides for the difficulty in respect to the matter of sacks?

Mr. BLANTON. I am just calling attention to the fact that the bill in section 8 has made a distinction between corn products, because it says that in so far as corn products are concerned the bill shall take effect 90 days after the passage, but with regard to wheat and all other products it does not take effect until one year after its passage.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman knows the reason why, does he not?

Mr. BLANTON. And I am calling attention to the fact that there are many sacks, containers for corn flour, grits, and hominy, which are already in existence, which means an outlay of an immense amount of money, all of which would probably be lost if they had to be disposed of within 90 days after the passage of the act, as it would be impossible to dispose of them through regular channels of trade within that short limit of time.

Mr. LAYTON. Does the gentleman not understand that for the protection of the public it is made 90 days, because corn products and corn will undergo fermentation in much less time than wheat?

Mr. BLANTON. I knew that corn was probably undergoing fermentation in some of the mountains of northern Alabama and in other secluded places, but I did not know that that process was being carried on in Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. It goes on in Texas, a great deal of it.

Mr. BLANTON. No; we have other use for our corn there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, there are several amendments to be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina object?

Mr. STEVENSON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina objects, and the question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, that was merely a pro forma amendment, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO: Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "packed, shipped."

Mr. WINGO. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if it is intended to apply the penalty of this act to a man who simply packs for his own use, not for public consumption and sale?

Mr. VESTAL. It certainly is not, nor does the language here apply that way at all.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman be willing to say, when the same are packed or shipped for sale, sold, or offered for sale?

Mr. VESTAL. I think the language in the bill is preferable.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the lawyers to examine the language on the first page, "packed," and a comma after it, "shipped," and a comma after it, "sold," a comma after it, "or offered for sale in packages," and so forth. Now, what does that do? Just what the gentleman says it is not intended to do. Of course the gentleman does not intend it. What the gentleman wants to do is to cover commodities that are packed for sale for consumption by the public. He does not intend to cover the mere packing of it. He does not intend to require the small miller or farmer to pack it in a certain sized package or to ship it, even though he may ship it from his farm to his feeding yards. What the gentleman intends to do is to cover the question of the package when it is packed and shipped for sale and consumption by the general public. Now, if you knock out the words "packed and shipped" it will read this way: "And the standard measure for such commodities, when the same are sold or offered for sale." Now, if you prohibit the sale of it, offered for sale, except in your standard packages, you have done everything that you want to do. Why penalize the man if the packing is for himself and the shipping is to himself for his own consumption? Do you want to protect him against fraud or against himself? Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, just a word. The gentleman has hammered at this so long that somebody might believe he was serious, although he and I both know he is not. If you are going to have a law, you want to have a law that can be enforced, and the desirable thing is not to enforce it against the retail dealer, but enforce it against the miller who puts up the packages, enforce it by examining the package in his mill not offered for sale. Nobody knows it will be offered for sale. There will be no way of proving it is offered for sale, because it is not yet offered for sale. It is some of the large millers, who, if anybody, violate the law when they put up the package, when they put it upon cars for shipment, should be liable to the law. Now, the farmer putting wheat flour which he grinds—and I believe there are many of them—in a barrel will not be affected by this bill if he consumes his own flour. The gentleman need not be so unduly sensitive on that subject. Let us have a law that can be enforced.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the word "packed," insert the words "for sale."

Mr. WINGO. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] seems to be so constituted this morning that he thinks everybody is joking about this bill. Now, I am serious, though it requires an effort to be serious about this bill, a joke itself. If the gentleman had had the experience that some of my constituents have had on a similar proposition under a Federal statute he would see the necessity. He says of course they catch them—but who is going to punish the farmer?—that it is intended to catch the big miller. No; the big miller wrote this bill. Now, if you are sincere and you do not want to penalize the farmer, then accept the words "packed for sale." Now, we will see whether you are serious, whether or not you are sincere. Now, that will carry out the gentleman's argument. That will make it what the gentleman from Illinois and what the chairman of the committee himself says they want to do, and it will prevent the doing of what he says they do not intend to do. Of course, nobody wants to do that. Of course, Congress did not intend when it once passed a law to penalize the local selling organizations of peaches, and yet on the platform in my town we almost had a riot among farmers who were incensed by a combination of shippers who were threatening them with a Federal statute that had in it loose language just like this.

If the gentleman lived among agricultural people and knew the problems that confronted them upon the question of shipping and packing and these little cooperative associations, then he would understand that there are some things that are very serious to them that may be a matter of mere levity to the gentleman. Now, if you want to do this, if you think your present laws do not already protect men against fraud, if you think the system as it is to-day does not protect him, all right; but when you are going to the extreme of fixing the size of packages and penalize him for not using that package, for God's sake let us limit it to those packed for public consumption and not when packed for personal or home consumption.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The vote now comes on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 10.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STEVENSON: Page 1, line 5, after the word "stuffs," insert the words "intended to be used in interstate commerce."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have proposed merely makes it conform to what I conceive Congress has the power to do, and that is to regulate the size of packages that enter into interstate commerce. I know that the contention is made that Congress has the right to regulate the standard of weights and measures. That is true. Now, let us see what that is in the Constitution:

To coin money, to regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and to fix the standard of weights and measures.

Now, does that have reference to the size of packages in which people are allowed to sell their stuffs? There was no such question ever conceived by the constitutional convention. They can fix the number of ounces that it will take to make a pound, the number of pounds that it will take to make a ton; they can fix the number of cubic feet that it takes to make a cord, the number of inches in a foot, and the number of feet in a yard.

Now, to say that they can fix the number of tons of coal, for instance, that can be put on one freight train unless it is going into interstate commerce, or on one freight car, is entirely beyond the mark. To say that they can fix the number of pounds which they can put in a package of flour for sale, if it does not go into interstate commerce, is simply regulating a purely State matter and one that Congress has no right to regulate. It has no reference to the fixing of standards of weights and measures.

You take another instance. Under the right to fix the standard of measures they can say how many cubic feet shall go into a cord of wood, but would you undertake to say by congressional legislation that they can fix the number of cubic feet in a load of wood that a farmer could put on his wagon and offer for sale in his own community or town? I submit not. And this is not a regulation of standard of weights nor of measures. It has no relation to either of them. It has relation to the packages in which goods shall be put up, and those packages are measured by weights that are already fixed, and fixed by law.

Now, I submit that Congress has no power to do it. And some reference has been made to the pure food and drugs act. That is put expressly upon the question of interstate commerce, and the prohibitions contained therein are prohibitions against putting those things into interstate commerce. And, therefore, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make this question, because I do not want to be confronted some day with having voted for a measure that the Supreme Court will say is unduly interfering with the local affairs of the States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of controversy for a great many years over the power of Congress in regard to commerce between the States. The language of the Constitution was not very broad or defining. Gradually a great many powers have come to be exercised by the General Government under the commerce clause of the Constitution. But there is no such difficulty in reference to the weights-and-measures provision of the Constitution. The Constitution expressly authorizes Congress to establish standards of weights and measures. Congress has practically the same power, if it chooses to exercise it, over weights and measures that it has over coinage. We have the absolute power. To hold we can only say how many pounds there are in a bushel is a ridiculous proposition.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman says that we have the same power over packages of flour as we have over coinage. Can the gentleman explain why it is, then, that explicit authority is given the Government to provide for the punishment of the counterfeiting of the coin in the very next clause and it does not make any provision for violating any regulation over standards of weights and measures?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is a provision in reference to counterfeiting. But there is the positive provision that Congress may establish, that Congress is the only power in the Government generally that can establish, standards of weights and measures.

Mr. BENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. BENSON. Do you think that Congress should pass a bill that puts over 25 gold dollars into a bag?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not know. That is not a pertinent question.

Mr. BENSON. The question here is that they can only put 25 pounds of flour in a bag.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is not the question and that is not the bill, either. Congress has the power, under the Constitution, to establish a standard of weights and measures. It can say what shall be the standard of any kind of an article that is put in packages or measures. Now, this is not a new proposition here.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that by saying that flour shall be put in a package, weighing a certain number of pounds, Congress is thereby establishing a standard of a measure?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Why, certainly; that is exactly what it is doing.

Mr. WALSH. What measure is being standardized?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The standard of measures for flour.

Mr. WALSH. What measure is being standardized?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The standard of measures for flour. I can not be any more explicit than that. You create a standard of measures. That is what you do.

Mr. WALSH. What measure?

Mr. STEVENSON. Does not this bill recognize that the standard of measure for flour has already been fixed in pounds and undertakes to prescribe how many of those measures shall be put in a package?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No. It fixes the standard of measure for flour. That is exactly what it does. It fixes how you measure flour, and you sell by measure.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will permit, does it not, as a matter of fact, simply standardize the package and is not a measure at all?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, a package is a measure. No; it standardizes the measure. It creates a measure.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. You have got your pounds and quarts and gallons and pecks and half bushels and your bushels. This only just simply establishes the sack of 5, 10, 15, 20 pounds, and so forth. It is on the same line precisely.

Mr. WALSH. That does not establish any standard at all.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The difficulty the gentleman has is that it is a measure of flour.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that he was in doubt; and on a division (suggested by the Chairman) there were—ayes 29, noes 22.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-five Members are present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 9755) to establish the standard of weights and measures for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes, and finding itself without a quorum, he had ordered the roll to be called, whereupon 276 Members—a quorum—had answered to their names, and he presented a list of absentees for printing in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

Thereupon the committee resumed its session.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that, on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON], a division disclosed the fact that no quorum was present and a point of order that no quorum was present having been made, the committee rose, and the Chair now holds that the vote comes back on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]. Those in favor of the amendment——

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: Page 1, line 5, after the word "stuffs," insert "intended to be used in interstate commerce."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that he was in doubt; and on a division (suggested by the Chairman) there were—ayes 56, noes 85.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. STEVENSON and Mr. VESTAL to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 85.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUTCHINSON: Page 1, line 3, after the word "weights," insert "when packed."

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, was received.

STANDARD OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HUTCHINSON. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to protect the retailer or the small grocery man. This puts it up to the miller to have the weight according to the bill. But as most of all the products that this bill covers dry out, by reason of the moisture drying out, it is impracticable to keep the weight as packed.

Our friends on the other side say that the Bureau of Standards will tolerate any loss by drying out. We have had some experience in that regard under the food-control act. When the food-control act was before our committee an amendment was offered to the bill introduced to repeal the mixed-flour law, and also to reduce the size of the packages of flour made by the miller, and we finally provided that the miller could make any kind of flour out of wheat. We all know the results of that rule and regulation of the food-control act, and I am sure that we dread this very thing, because, as I said, take flour put up in a 10-pound package and put it in a grocery store behind the stove and it will dry out between 2 and 3 pounds. This bill makes that man liable to a penalty of $500. This amendment protects him without any question, because it requires that the miller shall have standard weights when packed. I trust that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to have the amendment read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON] will accomplish the purpose which he desires to accomplish, and I do not think any amendment should be inserted in the bill which will accomplish the purpose that he has in mind.

As I stated the other day, you can not make two packages of exactly the same size, and there is a variation in weight according to the moisture content in everything. That is already covered by the provisions in the bill which provide practically that the Bureau of Standards, under the Secretary of Commerce, shall provide for reasonable variations or tolerances, and I assume that in fixing the standard of weight for flour, for instance, the standard will be fixed upon a basis of moisture content, and that variations will be allowed. But if you require the Government to prove the amount of the exact weight at the time an article was packed, of course you know that can not be done. The Government will not have any facilities for obtaining any such proof at all. They can not establish the weight when the article was packed in the mill, and in order to have a workable law you have got to have it so it can be operated and enforced.

Now, if a barrel of flour dries out and the moisture content weighs less, there is no difficulty at all in fixing the variation or tolerance to provide for that, and that is exactly what will be done; but while the Government can establish what the moisture content is at the time the package is weighed it can never establish what the weight was when the article was packed, unless it is weighed by a Government officer at the time it is packed.

All these questions were gone over thoroughly when the matter was up in reference to the pure-food law and the amendments to that law. Originally people insisted that it would be impossible. They used to say that you could not put the same quantity of tomatoes in each of two tomato cans, because there might be a variation in the weight of the tomatoes, an increase in moisture content in one over the other. But there never has been the slightest difficulty in reference to these matters since the tolerances were fixed by the department. As a rule these things are done by averages, and to say that you invite millers to make overmoist flour in order to weigh more heavily would be a grave mistake, but to insert this provision in the bill would be to say that it will be absolutely impracticable to enforce it as a law.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the standard packages for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flour, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, when the same are packed, shipped, sold, or offered for sale in packages of 5 pounds or over, shall be those containing net avoirdupois weight 100 pounds, or multiples of 100 pounds, or the following fractions thereof: Five, 10, 25, and 50 pounds, and in addition, but for commercial feeding stuffs only, 60, 70, and 80 pounds.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do so for the purpose of directing attention once more to the language of the bill, which, according to my interpretation of it, fails to fix a standard of measure; and while I appreciate that it is rather taking a chance to disagree with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois in his interpretation of language in a measure—because when one does so he generally finds he is on the wrong side—yet I submit that there is nothing in this bill which can be interpreted as fixing a standard.

In 1912 the Congress passed a law fixing the standard barrel for apples and also a standard crate. In fixing the standard it used language as follows:

The standard barrel for apples shall be of the following dimensions when measured without distention of its parts: Length of staves, 28½ inches; diameter of head, 17½ inches; distance between heads, 26 inches; circumference of bulge, 64 inches, outside measurement, representing as nearly as possible 7,056 cubic inches: Provided, That the steel barrel containing the interior dimensions provided for shall be construed as a compliance therewith.

Now, that fixed the standard of the package, or of the measure, that measure being the barrel.

It fixed the standard, prescribed dimensions, and fixed its contents. In this bill here we say that a barrel shall weigh 200 pounds, but you could put those 200 pounds into a barrel that would hold 250 pounds, under the language of this bill, simply saying that a barrel of flour shall contain net avoirdupois 200 pounds, and these other various packages shall contain net avoirdupois 5, 10, 25, or 50 pounds, and then for commercial feedstuffs 60, 70, or 80 pounds.

I can not see where we are standardizing anything except to say that certain packages shall contain net avoirdupois 60 pounds or 25 pounds. But those pounds may be in a package capable of holding very much more. It seems to me that if we are going to fix the standard of a measure we should adopt language similar to that employed in the standard apple barrel bill, in which we stated what the dimensions of the barrel should be and prescribe the distance between the heads and the length of the staves. That bill, as I understand it, either as originally drafted or as afterward amended, provided for variations and tolerances, just as this does, but I have been unable to find the language in this proposed measure which would prohibit putting 200 pounds of flour into a barrel that might contain 215 pounds or 230 pounds.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Do I understand the logic of the gentleman's position to be that under the guise of exercising a constitutional authority to fix weights and measures this bill, as a matter of fact, exceeds our constitutional authority?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think it does what it purports to do or what it is claimed that it will do, and therefore it does not come within the constitutional provision, in my opinion.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Is it the intention of the bill to establish a new standard of measurement, or is it intended to fix the number of units of measure of these different ingredients?

Mr. WALSH. If you are going to fix the units of measurement of the ingredients you are not fixing a standard measurement.

Mr. BEGG. I agree that the standard unit of weight is the pound.

Mr. WALSH. I suppose Congress has the right to say that it will fix the standard measure of a barrel of flour of 200 pounds, of the following dimensions, and to provide variations and tolerances, but I have been unable to find in this language, either in section 1 or 2, anything that restricts the container which is supposed to be the standard measure, restricting that to a certain size. It might permit 200 pounds of flour to be put into a barrel that would hold 230 pounds, and still you would say that was the standard measure of flour under this bill.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Is not the aim of this to fix the number of units that must be sold as a barrel and no attempt made to fix the dimensions of the barrel?

Mr. WALSH. Then I do not think you are establishing a standard of weights as is claimed.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Where in the bill does the gentleman find anything about a barrel of flour and weighing 200 pounds? I have studied the bill carefully, and I can not find where it fixes the standard of a barrel of flour at 200 pounds.

Mr. WALSH. One hundred pounds and multiples thereof.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; but it does not mention the barrel or 200 pounds.

Mr. WALSH. I assumed that was the language taken in conjunction with the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana who opened the discussion on the bill, also in conjunction with the tables printed in the RECORD to which he referred. I took it that that was one of the prime purposes and that it was done in that way. If that be not so then you could put up these products in a tube 10 feet long, 4 or 5 inches in diameter, or put it in a big box, or any kind of a package whatever. I think it is a wise thing to standardize the measures. I would like to be assured that the language which is employed here does it. If so, how can it be claimed that this language does it when we standardize the apple barrel by fixing the dimensions of the barrel.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is it not possible that section 2 instead of being a standard of measures would come under the head of a standard of weights. It is not a standard of measure since there are no actual dimensions.

Mr. WALSH. That is true.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. It is a standard of weight.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "standard" strike out the word "packages" and insert the word "weights."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, there has been some criticism that the language of the bill exceeds the constitutional authority conferred on Congress as to fixing weights and measures. Unquestionably we have the right to fix the weight and prescribe the measures. Some criticism has been leveled at the bill because it was contended that we were seeking to provide for a standard package instead of a standard of weight or a standard of measure. The amendment I offer—and I call the attention of the membership of the committee to it—provides that the word "package" be stricken out and the word "weight" put in, so that it will read:

SEC. 2. That the standard weights for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, when the same are packed, shipped, sold, or offered for sale in packages of 5 pounds or over, shall—

And so forth.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Does not the word "those" in line 8 refer back to the word "packages" in line 4?

Mr. GARD. I think so.

Mr. GARRETT. If that be the case and the gentleman's amendment prevails, would it not be necessary to substitute something for the word "those"?

Mr. GARD. Yes; possibly that is true; but I am convinced that the proposition I have laid down by changing the word "packages" to the word "weights" is putting in better language under the intent and authority of the Constitution.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the gentleman will look down the section he will find that under his amendment it would read like this—

That the standard weights shall be those containing net avoirdupois weight 100 pounds, or multiples of 100 pounds, or the following fractions thereof.

What goes between is simply explanatory.

Mr. GARD (reading)—

That the standard packages for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, when the same are packed, shipped, sold, or offered for sale in packages of 5 pounds or over.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is all explanatory; you skip from "packages," which is the subject, down to the phrase "shall be those containing net avoirdupois weight 100 pounds." That is the predicate.

Mr. GARRETT. In other words, as I attempted to call the attention of the committee, the word "those" in line 8 refers back to "packages" in line 4.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. GARD. The word "those" could be stricken out.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would still be the same thing. The purpose is to establish a standard package.

Mr. GARD. Under the amendment I have offered, and I submit it for the consideration of my fellow members of the committee, it would be necessary, I see, to strike out the word "those" in line 8, so that the amendment as completed would say that the standard weight for certain wheat-mill and corn-mill products when the same are packed, shipped, sold, or offered for sale in packages of 5 pounds or over shall be those containing net avoirdupois weight 100 pounds, and so forth.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the gentleman would change it so that he would put it in grammatical terms, still it would read that the standard weight shall contain net avoirdupois weight of 100 pounds. What you want to do is to provide that the package shall contain so many pounds in weight.

Mr. TILSON. Would not the purpose be served by inserting "weight of" between the words "standard and packages," so that it would read "the standard weight of packages"?

Mr. GARD. That might be better.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the intention of this section, it is not as was suggested a few moments ago by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] and acquiesced in by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], namely, that this section was to deal with a standard weight, but it is to fix a standard package.

Mr. WALSH. And measure.

Mr. GARRETT. It seems to me that the purpose is to fix a standard package. If it is to be changed so as to fix a standard weight, if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] is to prevail, striking out the word "packages" in line 4 and inserting the word "weight," so as to make it a standard weight and not a standard package, I should think that he would want to strike out not only the word "those" in line 8 but also the words "containing net avoirdupois weight." Then the section would read:

That the standard weights for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, viz, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, when the same are packed, shipped, sold, or offered for sale in packages of 5 pounds or over shall be 100 pounds, or multiples of 100 pounds, or the following fractions thereof—

And so forth.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment that I have offered by so changing it as to have the amendment authorize the insertion of the words "weight of" before the word "packages" in line 4 and to strike out on lines 8 and 9 the words "those containing net avoirdupois weight."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I suggest to the gentleman that if he strike out the words "those containing net avoirdupois weight" in lines 8 and 9 it would not be necessary to insert the words "weight of" before the word "packages" in line 4, as he requests. If you insert the word "weight" instead of the word "package" and then strike out the words "those containing net avoirdupois weight," the section will read:

That the standard weight for the following wheat-mill * * * and all commercial feeding stuffs * * * shall be 100 pounds—

And so forth.

Mr. GARD. I prefer to have the weight refer to packages, and I think probably the language that I offer more completely expresses my desire.

The CHAIRMAN. In order that the Members may clearly understand the amendment, without objection the Clerk will read the amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But it has not yet been reported as modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The first amendment was reported. The gentleman from Ohio then asked unanimous consent to modify it, and the Chair now suggests that the whole amendment as modified be read for the information of the Members. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 2, line 4, after the word "standard," insert the words "weight of," and in lines 8 and 9 100 pounds or the following fractions thereof.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I do not quite get what this does yet, but I know that it entirely changes the purpose of the section. The purpose of this section is to fix a standard measurement in which flour shall be put——

Mr. GARD. Package.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, well, a package is a measure. That is what a package is, an inclosure in a measure. The purpose is to fix the standard of measure. I do not see what is accomplished by saying that 100 pounds of flour shall contain 100 pounds. Everybody knows that 100 pounds of flour weighs 100 pounds, and that is all it amounts to.

Mr. GARD. No; it will not. This is the way that it will read if the amendment prevails:

That the standard weight of packages for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products * * * shall be 100 pounds or multiples of 100 pounds or the following fractions thereof.

In other words, it gives a complete expression to what I assume was the legislative intent to prescribe a weight for a package, since that is what is carried out in the latter part of the bill. It is true, as I read upon more serious consideration of section 2, that it applies to a package, but nevertheless that which is proposed to apply to the package as contained in the latter part of section 2 is to designate its weight, because as section 2 now is it provides that these packages of 5 pounds or more shall be of weights of 100 pounds or multiples or fractions thereof.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes; but section 2 is to establish the size of a package.

Mr. GARD. Not the size of a package; the weight of a package.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Absolutely the size of the package.

Mr. GARD. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is to establish the size, not the weight of the package. One package may weigh 10 pounds and another half a pound, but the purpose of section 2 is to establish the size of the package. It establishes the size of the package by the weight of the flour that goes into it. The package may be empty. Section 3 then provides that the size of the packages shall be used in packing flour.

Mr. GARD. Section 3 is a penalty section.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is more than a penalty section.

Mr. GARD. I do not think it is.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is a provision in section 3 against the use of other sizes of packages. Section 2 establishes the size of the package. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] said this bill did not establish the size of a package. This says that a certain package shall be one that will contain 100 pounds of flour. It does not say it in quite that language, but it says "containing 100 pounds of flour" and another containing 5 pounds of flour. That is the size of the package, and that is the standard of measure. That is exactly what the bill is to accomplish.

Mr. GARD. There is no designation of size, except the size as determined by the weight inclosed in the package.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, certainly; but that 100 pounds of flour will be the same size if put in a bag, a box, a barrel, or other container.

Mr. GARD. Oh, no. I can see where 100 pounds in a bag or a sack might be an entirely different size as we understand the word "size"——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, no; it would occupy the same amount of space and that is a question of size.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association to pack, or cause to be packed, to ship or offer for shipment, or to sell, or offer for sale, the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, which, when in package form, shall not be one of the standard sizes established in section 2 hereof and bear a plain, legible, and conspicuous statement of the net weight contained therein; and any person, firm, corporation, or association guilty of a violation of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be liable to a fine not exceeding $500 in a court of the United States having jurisdiction.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word——

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Is it proper procedure to correct the text of the bill before striking out the last word?

Mr. WALSH. This is perfecting it.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Ohio have a perfecting amendment?

Mr. WALSH. That does not give priority of recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that, having recognized the gentleman from Massachusetts, the gentleman from Massachusetts can proceed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman having this measure in charge if the language on page 3, lines 1 and 2, means that prosecutions for violations of this act are confined to the Federal courts?

Mr. VESTAL. I think so; certainly.

Mr. WALSH. And it is not intended to provide any punishment other than a fine, no matter how often and how grossly this act may have been violated?

Mr. VESTAL. I think that is the plain language of the bill and shows it.

Mr. WALSH. Well, the reason I asked the question was that certain intentions have been ascribed to this measure from the language which it contains which I have been unable to find are borne out by a reading of the bill, and I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think the penalty here for violating the provisions of section 2 ought to be more severe for a second or third offense?

Mr. VESTAL. The language of the bill provides that the fine shall not exceed $500, but the fine for the first offense might be $50 or $100.

Mr. WALSH. I will ask unanimous consent to withdraw the pro forma amendment, and yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 15 and 16, after the word "association," strike out the words "to pack or cause to be packed, to ship or offer for shipment, or."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, as one who is in sympathy with proper legislation upon the subject matter of the bill, I wish to ask the particular attention of the committee having it in charge to that amendment. I think that all the beneficial purposes of this legislation can be accomplished with that language omitted. What the committee desires to do evidently is to bring about uniformity for the purpose of commerce. It is for the convenience of the public, the producers and consumers alike, that this bill is designed. But if this language which I move to have stricken out is retained in the bill, it seems to me that it may cause a great deal of annoyance without accomplishing any good purpose whatever. What harm can there possibly be in putting these materials in packages other than the standard size if those packages are not placed on the market in any way? If some one desires to send to a friend or a member of his family in another State or another town a sack of flour or barrel of flour as a gift, not for sale, not in a commercial way, what harm can there possibly be in permitting the sending or giving it away in any size package he may desire? I ask the gentleman, will not the purpose of the bill be accomplished with that language left out? But as it is now, if some person down in my country, if there were any who would have such a kind thought, desired to send me a barrel of flour or a sack of flour, why, he would have to go out and hunt up a package, a container, of the standard size in order to ship it to me. It occurs to me no good purpose can be served by requiring that, and you have accomplished everything that is necessary if you have protected the commerce of the country.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, it does not seem to me, I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee, that the language in this bill as it is drawn will bear out the construction that the gentleman gives it. It is not for the purpose of affecting a private person who wants to give somebody a package of flour or meal, but it is for the purpose of taking care of the miller or manufacturer who is packing or offering to pack or causing to pack or offering to ship or shipping these different packages. Now, it seems to me we ought to get right at the root of the thing so as to prevent the manufacturer from putting up in packages other than the packages provided for under his bill.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. I will yield.

Mr. GARRETT. I am in perfect sympathy with that. I think the manufacturers themselves would desire that. Let me call the attention of the gentleman—and I think it is worthy of very serious attention. This says that it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, and so forth, "to pack or cause to be packed." This, literally construed, would mean that the individual could not carry his own turn of wheat to the mill and have it ground and let it be packed in other than the standard package, even though for his own use. There is not any doubt about that if this language is literally construed; and that is not intended by the committee, I am sure, but that is what it says.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will yield, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether, in line 19, there is any saving clause, "when in package form"?

Mr. GARRETT. That refers to commercial feed stuffs when in package form; and the way I construe it, if this language is left in the bill—and, I repeat, I am speaking as one friendly to the legislation—it will be absolutely an offense for a man to pack the materials that are involved in the bill in anything except a standard package, even though it is not intended to be offered for sale or shipment.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] has the floor.

Mr. VESTAL. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BEGG. I would suggest to the chairman of the committee that he can cure the supposed ills of the gentleman's contention if he will add the words "for sale" in line 15, after the word "packed," so that it will read:

Or association to pack, or cause to be packed, for sale.

That will care for the proposition you are raising, will it not?

Mr. GARRETT. Perhaps; then, down further, there ought to be the same words after "shipment."

Mr. BEGG. That is true.

Mr. GARRETT. That might meet the situation.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Tennessee uses the term "standard package." Does the gentleman think we have any right to establish a standard package?

Mr. GARRETT. Well, I do not know. We have the right to establish standard weights and measures. A package, I suppose, is, in a sense, a measure.

Mr. WALSH. It is constantly referred to as "standard package."

Mr. GARRETT. The word "package" is used in section 2.

Mr. WALSH. It certainly is.

Mr. GARRETT. And I am meeting the condition that is set forth by the language of the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee wants to strike out the packing and shipping provisions, as I understood him? That was his amendment?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What is the point in striking out the shipping provision?

Mr. GARRETT. Well, because I do not think that there is any necessity, unless it is in commerce, for fixing the size of the package in which it shall be shipped.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But here, after all, is the situation about all these things. Possibly it would cover the case if you would simply provide in reference to the package for sale. But once in a while there may be a prosecution under a law like this. The whole theory of our legislation for years has been to so provide as not to encourage prosecution against the little fellow, but to encourage, if prosecution is to be had, that it shall be against the man behind.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Now, nobody wants the retail dealer handling flour that is short in weight to be prosecuted. It never has been the policy of the departments in forcing these laws to go after that man. They go after the man who has sold to him and go back, if they can, to the man who produced it in the first instance, such as the manufacturer. They are the fellows we ought to get.

Now, they are not guilty. Oh, they may have been guilty of sales. You frequently want to catch them if they have a carload of stuff before it gets into the hands of the retailer. They ought to be subject to the prosecution. Now, as a matter of fact, of course, if a law of this sort is passed there probably will not be very many prosecutions if the miller feels that he is obliged to follow the law. Let us make him obliged to follow the law. If you insert the words "for sale" after the word "packed," it seems to me it would cover the objection offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, but to say that they shall be inserted also after the word "shipment" does not mean anything.

Mr. GARRETT. I did not myself suggest that it should be inserted after the word "shipment." Merely being on my feet, and inquiry being made about whether if it were inserted after the word "packed" in line 15 it would meet the condition, I said it might require some additional amendment further on; that that would meet the situation. That is all I am interested in doing.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand.

Mr. GARRETT. I do not think anybody wants innocent people to be subjected to the possibility even of annoyance.

Mr. MANN of Illinois Of course not.

Mr. LAYTON. I just want to ask a question for a little information. Suppose, for instance, I want to ship to a son or a relative some miles away from where I live. This now says it is unlawful, if I offer for shipment, unless it is in a standard package. Suppose I want to send 95½ pounds of buckwheat for winter use, am I making a breach of law?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If you want to send 95½ pounds of buckwheat to somebody, you ought to have another guess coming. What sense would there be in weighing out 95½ pounds of buckwheat?

Mr. LAYTON. The sense would be this, that I would not be measuring my buckwheat when I was giving it away.

Mr. GARRETT. Or if you wanted to ship it to a friend.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more, so that we can get this matter worked out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to be allowed to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. VESTAL. I think if the words "for sale" were placed after the word "packed," it would probably accomplish what the gentleman wants. It would read "or cause to be packed for sale."

Mr. GARRETT. I think that amendment meets the situation in part.

Mr. LAYTON. I think it would meet both, because it is to be packed before it is shipped.

Mr. GARRETT. Probably that might be true. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to withdraw my amendment. Let the gentleman offer that amendment.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VESTAL: Page 2, line 15, after the word "packed," insert the words "for sale."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to be heard on the amendment?

Mr. VESTAL. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote comes on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 2, line 19, after the word "in," insert the words "original unbroken."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in the discussion in general debate on this bill questions were asked as to whether a grocer, for instance, who had purchased a barrel of flour could sell an amount of flour to a customer other than 5 pounds, 10 pounds, or any other fractional number of pounds authorized by this bill. It is to protect the sale in small amounts, or broken amounts, if one may use that word, to the consumer that I have offered this amendment, which is taken from the rules and regulations as to unbroken packages. I read from the laws relative to the control of food, regulation 2 as it appears on page 100 of the compilation that I have in my hand, which provides that—

The term "original unbroken package" as used in this act is the original package, carton, case, can, box, barrel, bottle, phial, or other receptacle put up by the manufacturer, to which the label is attached, or which may be suitable for the attachment of a label, making one complete package of the food or drug article. The original package contemplated includes both the wholesale and retail package.

Now, it is my idea that this amendment takes care and provides merely that it shall be in the original unbroken wholesale package as it comes to one who may afterwards sell to the retail trade. If the amendment is not included, this section 3 is open, at least, to the technical accusation that every package offered for sale, no matter where it may be or by whom, shall be one of the standard sizes established in section 2. It would seem to me that the purpose would be manifestly and properly carried out if the standard sizes set out in section 2 were the sizes made for shipment by the original manufacturer or wholesaler, so that when the package was put up at the place where it was manufactured it should be of the standard size and should contain the standard weight as set out on page 2, and for that purpose I offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 0.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: On line 20, after the word "standard," strike out the word "sizes" and insert the word "measures."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 2, line 20, after the word "standard" strike out the word "sizes" and insert in lieu thereof the word "measures."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that this bill purports to fix standards of measures, I think we would clarify the language in section 3 if we should recognize, at least in the section fixing the penalty, that we are attempting to do that which the Constitution permits us to do. In trying to establish a standard package we should make it clear that we are establishing a standard of measurement.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggests that "a rose by any other name may smell as sweet." It may be true; but the language of the Constitution is specific, and I think we might well follow that phraseology.

I want to direct the attention of the committee to another act of Congress whereby we fixed the standard of measure. In passing the act of March 4, 1915, known as the "standard fruit and vegetable barrel law," we provided that the length of staves should be 28 inches and the diameter of the head and the distance between the heads and the thickness of the staves should be so much, and then provided that even though we fixed that as a standard, any barrel of a different form which had a capacity of 7,056 cubic inches should be considered as a standard barrel. Then we fixed the dimensions, size, cubic contents, and thickness of the staves of the barrel of cranberries, which are a product which makes a certain portion of my district famous, and in that respect we followed the precedent when we established a standard apple barrel bill, and there is an entire absence of any such detail in this legislation.

For that reason I think this amendment ought to appeal to gentlemen who are anxious that a standard shall be known, definite, and fixed. Let us make it clear that we are not establishing a standard of weight but a standard of measure.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. If you changed the word "sizes," in line 20, to "measures," you would then refer to the measures presumably established in section 2. Will you please point out where any measures are established in section 2?

Mr. WALSH. Well, I think myself that I have not changed my mind since I discussed section 2 with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. We have not definitely fixed any measure in section 2.

Mr. WELLING. You have fixed weights in section 2.

Mr. WALSH. We have fixed containers—standard packages.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may have two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. WELLING. We have fixed weights at least in section 2—standard weights. Would not the gentleman be willing to substitute "weights" for "measures" on line 20? Would he not be willing to substitute the word "measures" in place of the present word "sizes"?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think we have fixed any standard weights in section 2.

Mr. WELLING. We refer to them.

Mr. WALSH. We refer to standard packages. We have not fixed any standard weights in section 2. The standard of weights has already been fixed.

Mr. WELLING. In section 2 it is provided that they "shall be those containing net avoirdupois weight 100 pounds, or multiples of 100 pounds or the following fractions thereof: 5, 10, 25, and 50 pounds, and, in addition, but for commercial feeding stuffs only, 60, 70, and 80 pounds."

Mr. WALSH. That is the content of a standard package.

Mr. WELLING. No. A standard package is prescribed.

Mr. WALSH. That is the content of a standard package.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WALSH. I will, if I have any time left.

Mr. GARRETT. It seems to me that the gentleman's amendment would be still happier by using the word "packages."

Mr. WALSH. I think it would be very unsafe to use "standard packages." I contend that we have not the right to establish standard packages, but we have the right to establish standard measures.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I think it is of very little consequence whether we use the word "size" or the word "measure." I would like, however, to call attention to the fact that for two days, now, the House of Representatives has been devoting its time to legislation contained in this bill of four pages. We have managed to finish up two pages. Now, if we have not any more important business before us than a bill of this nature, to take up two days of the time of the House of Representatives, I suggest that we recess for a week or two, and let us get caught up with our committee work. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. I suggest that the gentleman come over and sit with us. [Laughter.]

Mr. TREADWAY. I am not a member of the steering committee, and I do not want to criticize that committee or offer any criticism about any individuals, but it does seem to me that the playful manner in which this discussion has gone along for two days is quite manifest. My colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. WALSH, is one of the ablest men in consuming time when he knows that that is the only object, to kill time. He is very clever at it. [Laughter.]

The amendment under consideration is an indication of his ability along that line. But in all seriousness I do want to suggest to the House that Members of Congress have work to do in addition to sitting here on the floor. But we are criticized if we are not here on the floor when the House is in session. If there is nothing better to do than to occupy two days with a bill of this nature and importance, I say let us recess and catch up with our office work three days at a time. [Applause.]

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] a question for information. Suppose I purchase from my grocer in the little village where I live, 12 pounds of hominy. How would that grocer send the amount of that purchase to me?

Mr. VESTAL. I do not know how he would send it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. What sort of a package would he put it in?

Mr. VESTAL. I could not tell the gentleman what sort of a package he would put it in, because I do not know the gentleman's grocer, and I do not know what kind of packages he is in the habit of using.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am supposing that my grocer is conforming his business to this proposed statute. Under the terms of this law how would that grocer send me 12 pounds of grits, or hominy, that is to say what sort of package or container would he be compelled to use?

Mr. VESTAL. I do not know anything in this law that would prevent him from sending 12 pounds of hominy in any way he chose.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Let us see.

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association to pack, or cause to be packed, to ship or offer for shipment, or to sell, or offer for sale, the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, which, when in package form, shall not be one of the standard sizes established in section 2 hereof and bear a plain, legible, and conspicuous statement of the net weight contained therein.

Now this section prescribes standard packages, or containers—and there is no 12-pound package, or 2-pound package.

The food must be in a package when he sends it to me, whether that be a box, or bag. I repeat my question. How would that grocer send me 12 pounds of hominy, having in mind that it must be dispatched in a package, or packages, designated as standard? Would he send it to me in a 15-pound container bearing an inscription showing that the contents were only 12 pounds? The bill does not give him that authority. What would he do, in order to be on the safe side of the law?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I would like to have my question answered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from Indiana answered the question.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. How did he answer it?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That there was nothing in this law that would affect it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Is it the answer of the gentleman from Indiana that the grocer can send me 12 pounds in a 15-pound container?

Mr. VESTAL. He can send it to you in a tub if he wants to, or a washboiler.

Mr. LAYTON. Or an egg box.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Would the gentleman permit his grocer to send him 12 pounds of hominy loose out of a barrel, or something of that sort?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly, just as your grocer sends you 12 pounds of sugar loose out of a barrel. The gentleman's question does not indicate that he is very familiar with the way in which business is done by grocers handling small orders.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In my part of the country they do not permit that sort of thing, in the interest of pure food and the public health.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Well in the country if a customer asks for sugar, the grocer goes to his barrel, and weighs it out. If you make an order, he weighs it from his barrel, and sends it to you in a bundle. That is the ordinary, customary way in which the business is done. But under this bill, in the case suggested, and it is one that will often arise, whenever you order an odd number of pounds of a mill product, the grocer will not know how to send the goods, and at the same time be within the terms of this act. You may say that there will be no prosecutions upon the state of facts supposed. That presents another question. The grocer may be willing to take a chance on being prosecuted, but that does not answer my question. Either he can, or can not send the goods in a 12-pound bundle. If the law does not give him the authority to fill a 12-pound order, by sending it in a 12-pound sack, or other container, or in a larger container suitably marked to show the actual contents, then when he undertakes to do so, he violates the law and is subject to prosecution, whether or not an actual prosecution ensues. It seems to me that the only thing he can do, as the law is worded, will be to ignore my order, and send me a standard package or packages of goods that will approximate as to weight most nearly to that order.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, it has been frankly admitted that the legal effect of this bill is to make it illegal to put up any of these articles in irregular containers, but it is said that nobody would want to prosecute an innocent man. In other words, you propose to make it a criminal offense for the housewife to do this, in order to catch the big miller who wrote the bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is a pitiful confession for the friends of this measure to make, that it is necessary to write a law in such terms that the usual things done in ordinary, everyday business, will be illegal, in the hope of discouraging, or deterring illegal practices on a larger scale. If that indeed is the attitude of the members of the committee which fathers this bill, then they are entitled to our sympathy.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in lines 1 and 2, page 3, to strike out the words "in a court of the United States having jurisdiction."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BANKHEAD moves to amend line 1, page 3, after the figures "$500," by striking out the words "in a court of the United States having jurisdiction."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I suggest this amendment for the reason that as a matter of course a violation of this statute could not be taken jurisdiction of in any other forum except a court of the United States having jurisdiction. It seems to me in the interest of good verbiage and good construction these words which appear in the bill are absolutely unnecessary and that they may be stricken out, because as a matter of fact any prosecution would have to be in a district court of the United States in the first instance. It seems to me that the language—

Shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be liable to a fine not exceeding $500—should end the sentence.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I think it is unfortunate that the gentlemen in charge of the bill do not recognize the plain meaning of the language that they have used. I think also it would be more fortunate if some gentlemen who have attempted to defend the bill were more familiar with country life and with the habits of people who live in small communities. For illustration, following the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], section 3 provides—

That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association to pack.

Now, let us paraphrase a little bit, and instead of saying—

Unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, or association—

let us take the individual farm wife who packs great quantities of hominy at one time. There are some cities of the country where it is poisonous to expose anything to the public gaze, and they think it is terrible for a farm wife to do what all farm wives do, and what those familiar with farm life know they do when they make hominy in large quantities. It is the best hominy on earth, far superior to this stuff that you can get in the city markets.

Mr. LAYTON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WINGO. Now, let us paraphrase a little—

That it shall be unlawful for any housewife * * * to pack hominy.

In other words, if she does not pack her hominy in one of these packages they can hale her into court. Gentlemen say we have got to do that in order to prevent fraud on the part of the large miller. I am not interested in the solicitude of the large miller to protect the public against fraud, because the miller is the author of the bill. But gentlemen say that no district attorney, nor the Department of Justice, would prosecute the farmer who packs feed in sacks that are not of standard size, nor the housewife who packs hominy in nonstandard containers; that we can depend on the Department of Justice not to prosecute. Oh, we have had things like that, and it is a cause of trouble all the time. I had a case this morning where a little fellow runs the mail line and has to climb mountains with a Ford car, running between two trunk railways. It takes two days to go and return. A representative of the Government came around and said, "You have got to pay a tax; you are running in competition with the railway." Now, what has happened? I have got to send that man an affidavit, he has got to swear to it, and I have got to go and tell the department that there is no competition. In other words, you turn the Government agents into a judicial tribunal. God deliver us from a Government by agents and representatives going snooping around over the country. We have too much of that. If you want to fix a bill that will standardize the size of commercial products, you can say so in plain language—products that go into interstate commerce and that are put up for general consumption. You could do that, if you have not already gone far enough. You overlook the present law that protects a man from defective weight, impure stuff, but if you think it is more delectable and better for the public health and better for everything else that he must have it in certain sized packages, say so, and that it is for commercial transactions and not little transactions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I ask unanimous consent for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Arkansas to the fact that an amendment has been adopted in line 15, after the word "pack," to insert the words "for sale."

Mr. WINGO. I am glad that that was offered. I was out of the Chamber for a few moments eating lunch.

Mr. GARRETT. I think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] raised a very serious question, and the gentleman from Arkansas has also raised a serious question, if it had not been that this amendment was adopted.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand the gentleman, the words "for sale" have been inserted after the word "pack."

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; that it shall not be packed for sale.

Mr. WINGO. Let us see. Frequently the farmer's wife makes hominy in my country and sends it to town for sale. If she packs it and sends it to town for sale she would have to pack it in a standard container.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; it probably ought not to be, but I think that is true. The suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia, I hope, was met in a measure by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield in that connection?

Mr. WINGO. I will yield.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I had in mind an amendment to meet that suggestion and I went to the desk to find if any amendment had been adopted in that line. If the gentleman from Indiana had been aware of that amendment he would have been in a position to answer my question.

Mr. VESTAL. If the gentleman had been on the floor he would have known of the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Virginia should not be too severe on the gentleman from Indiana. He suggested that the hominy might be packed in a tub. Now, I do not know what kind of a tub they have in Indiana, but in my part of the country a tub could not be used for ground sorghum stalks or ground feed, and would not be considered a proper receptable for packing hominy.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan was recognized.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. VESTAL. I will make it 15 minutes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman modifies his request and makes it 15 minutes instead of 10. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, is not the regular order a vote on the amendment that I offered? I think debate has been exhausted on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair apologizes to the gentleman from Alabama. The question is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes had it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I only heard one vote in the negative and two or three in the affirmative, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were 25 ayes and 19 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the use of two small words that I think is wrong. This is a criminal statute and must be strictly construed. We find in line 17, on page 2, the following language:

It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, etc., to pack, or cause to be packed, etc., the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, etc.

I think the word "and," in line 17, should be "or"; otherwise, in case of arrest and prosecution, unless it can be shown that the defendant has both packed and shipped—that is, unless he has violated all these provisions or in all respects—it will not be possible to convict him. In line 18 the word "and" occurs after the word "grits" and also after the word "meals," and if a man is to be prosecuted it must be shown that he is guilty of selling wheat-mill products and corn-mill products and commercial feed products. I think the word "and" should be changed to "or." I have had some experience in drawing indictments, and I have had some experience in prosecuting under criminal statutes. I have also had a little experience here in drafting statutes to which criminal penalties are attached, and in my judgment the several different things that are hereby made unlawful should be connected, or rather separated, by the word "or"; they should not be connected by the word "and."

I would never draw a criminal statute in the way in which this one is drawn.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman will find that following the words "wheat-mill and corn-mill products" the various things are specifically named.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. But they are not the same; they are different products. One might violate respecting one and not the other. As the section is now drawn, in order to convict a defendant, it must be shown that he has violated respecting all of them; and the same is true in line 18 in respect to commercial feeding stuffs.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The language "and all commercial feeding stuffs" is purely surplusage. The courts would hold that you are limited to the divisions named—flour, hominy, grits, and meals. The court has decided that question time and time again. That is surplusage. This is a penal statute, and you would have to show it was either flour, hominy, grits, or meals, because you have undertaken to set out certain classes, and where you have named the classes that excludes all others.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The naming of certain things excludes others that are not named; that is true, but a man may violate respecting one of these things when he is not violating another.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. You would have to put it all into the indictment, and by your proof you could not show his guilt. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Following the criticism made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], I would like to ask the gentleman whether, inasmuch as this bill deals with chicken-feed containers, he would designate this as chicken-feed legislation?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I would characterize some of the criticisms as chicken-feed criticisms by those who wish to attract attention to themselves as being more industrious and virtuous than others. I think this is an important bill, but if it is passed in its present form it will contain serious faults, in my judgment. I agree with the criticism of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] respecting it. It is carelessly and improperly drafted. There ought to be some amendments, and I am suggesting one that I think is pertinent and necessary. It can be laughed out of court, as some of the gentlemen have tried to laugh away some of the amendments offered, like the criticism made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] when he points out that it will be impossible for a man to buy 8 pounds of hominy. He must buy a "standard" package containing 10 pounds, otherwise he and the merchant who sold it to him would both be subject to prosecution. He raised that question and he was laughed out of court, but he was right.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Would it not be better to strike out "wheat-mill and corn-mill products" and just say "flour and meal products, namely"?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It should read, "Any of the following mill products," and not all of them. Otherwise a man could not be convicted unless he had violated the statute respecting all of them. That is my criticism.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, after the figures "$500," insert the following: "By the term 'in original unbroken package form,' as used in this act, is meant any form of original package or carton or other container made or prepared to contain products for sale in such original package or other container and purporting to contain any specific weight or measure."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose for which I offer this amendment is to obviate some of the objectionable features that have been pointed out by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] and others in respect to inhibiting the farmer or the farm wife from packing and selling products in whatever available vessels or containers may be at hand. The bill has already been amended in section 3 to provide that these acts which are denounced shall be unlawful only when goods are packed for sale in original, unbroken package form. Under the amendment I propose that term is defined so that if this amendment is adopted the merchant could sell 3 or 6 or 8 or 9 pounds of any product in his store without violating the law, unless that product was packed in an original box or carton or package which was manufactured to contain such article and purported to contain a specific number of pounds. So that under the terms of the amendment a farm wife could sell the hominy that is home manufactured in any kind of container, so long as that container was not specifically manufactured to contain some particular number of pounds of hominy, or was not manufactured for use in containing such article in an original package. In the event such a package is used, then it would conform to the bill. It seems to me that if you adopt this amendment you will remove those objections to this bill which have been pointed out, and they ought to be removed. The miller is not concerned with sales in communities and is not concerned with the retail dealer selling articles in bulk, and it would not at all interfere with the requirements as to his business which the bill imposes. We all know, of course, that this bill was proposed by the millers. It is claimed that they want some standard measurement fixed for their products, so that there will be uniformity throughout the country.

But if the farmer's wife or somebody in the great city should want to go to a grocery and buy 3 pounds of flour or 7 pounds of flour or any number of pounds of an article which is shipped by the dealer in bulk, she ought to have the right to do so and the dealer ought to have the right to make such sales. There is no imposition involved in a sale when a purchaser comes and says he wants 6 pounds of some particular article. The dealer weighs out 6 pounds, sells it to her, and he ought to be permitted to do that and he is violating no law now on the statute books, and under my amendment he will be violating no law proposed to be enacted in this measure.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Under this measure, if the housewife here in Washington went down to her grocery that she deals with having 50 cents in her pocket and flour was worth 8 cents a pound and she wanted to buy 50 cents worth of flour, could the dealer weigh it out, put it in a paper bag as a package, and sell it to her?

Mr. CONNALLY. I rather think under the amendments already adopted he could do that, because it would not be in the original unbroken package, and my amendment is to amplify and clarify what is meant by the original unbroken package, so as to permit her to do that very thing and to remove, so far as possible, the annoyances and inconveniences which the bill would otherwise impose on the retailers and their customers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] the question that I rose to ask him a moment ago in line with the suggestions he was making—the merits of which I think will be conceded by every lawyer on this floor—Would it not be also true that in line 18 the word "all" ought to be "any," otherwise for the purpose of conviction the prosecuting officer would have to show that the wrongdoer had sold all of these commercial feedstuffs?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think the gentleman from Virginia is right in line with my suggestion and my idea of the bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I desire to offer the following amendment. Strike out the word "all," and insert the word "any."

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I am offering it in my time, and am not interfering with any other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers the amendment which the Clerk will read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 18, strike out the word "all" before the word "commercial" and insert in lieu thereof the word "any."

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] seemed disposed to criticize the committee for taking an undue amount of time in the consideration of this bill. I think this discussion has been one of the most fruitful discussions that I have ever followed because it has served to reveal the utter lack of comprehension of his task by the person or persons who originally submitted this bill to the committee, a bill which the gentleman from Indiana proudly states was unanimously reported by that committee. [Applause.] Without the amendments which have been added by the Committee of the Whole by the votes of Members on both sides of the aisle, this bill would impose the very greatest hardships and injustices in its practical operations upon small dealers, and that portion of the public dealing with small dealers. [Applause.]

As has been pointed out by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] and by others, it would be illegal under this act as drawn for a grocer in a village, or small town, or for that matter in a city to send out 6 pounds of sugar in any package other than a standard package.

Mr. BLANTON. Flour.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I should have said flour. We all know that in the small villages of the country these mill products are handled in bins. Think of the hardship involved in forbidding a grocer to send out a 6, or 7, or 11 pound package of grits, or hominy, or flour, but limiting his sales, and therefore the orders of his customers to the standard packages. So I say that the discussion in this body and the various amendments which have been offered, the amendments of the gentleman from Michigan, the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], and other amendments correcting the original crudities of this measure, have been of the very greatest value. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that there can be any question that the amendments offered by the gentleman from Michigan, and the amendment offered by myself ought to be adopted. Otherwise, when the officers of the law seek to secure a conviction under this act, they will be required to show that the defendant has sold all of the articles referred to. Such is not the real intent of the law. That intent is effectuated by the amendments proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to occupy time, but I wish to offer an amendment without debate.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There are two amendments pending.

The CHAIRMAN. They were merely offered for information.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If I have an opportunity to offer it after the others——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman I offer the following amendment: Page 2, line 17, strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or"; line 18, after the word "meals," strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan: Page 2, line 17, after the word "wheat-mill," strike out the word "and" and insert in lieu thereof the word "or"; line 18, after the word "meals," strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division, just for the purpose of checking up the committee.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 0.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to packages of the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, when intended for export to any foreign country, and packed according to the specifications or directions of the foreign purchaser, agent, or consignee; but if said wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, shall, in fact, be sold or offered for sale for domestic use or consumption, then this exception shall not exempt said articles from the operation of any of the other provisions of this act: Provided, however, That when packages of said wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs originally intended for export, have been packed in the packages customarily used in any foreign country, and it becomes necessary to offer these for sale or to sell them for domestic use or consumption, then such export packages may be sold for domestic use or consumption by special contract, if approved by the Director of the Bureau of Standards.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARRETT: Page 3, line 22, after the words "by the," strike out "Director of the Bureau of Standards" and insert "Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment shall prevail, of course it would logically be followed by amendments to subsequent sections changing the administration of this law from the Director of the Bureau of Standards and the Secretary of Commerce to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Now, I am not clear in my recollection as to where the enforcement of these prior standard laws that Congress has passed has been placed. Perhaps the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] can tell me whether they have been placed under the Director of the Bureau of Standards.

Mr. VESTAL. The Bureau of Standards in all these weight and measure bills.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, that being the case, possibly it should be continued as regards this measure, and yet somehow, Mr. Chairman, I am impressed with the thought that the Congress ought to try to centralize the enforcement of acts of this character in some one department in order to prevent a duplication of work.

Now, the Department of Agriculture is charged with the enforcement of the pure-food act. It is charged with the enforcement of various acts, and the duties of the agents of the Department of Agriculture in enforcing those acts will be exactly in line with the duties of the agents who will be employed in the enforcement of this act. And I am exceedingly anxious to do all that we can to prevent duplication and to prevent the building up in different departments here of large machines at the public expense for the enforcement of these simple statutes. I believe that this act may very properly, dealing, as it does, wholly with food and feed stuffs, be placed in the Department of Agriculture for enforcement.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. What does the gentleman understand by the language in this proviso:

When approved by the Bureau of Standards, that it may be sold by special contract.

Does that mean that a person going into a grocery store to get some of these meals, and they have them in these packages, there has got to be some special transaction before he can purchase them different than if they were put in a regular package?

Mr. GARRETT. I suppose that the common-sense meaning of it would be this, that if a miller has prepared certain of these stuffs for export, to be sold in a foreign country, and has packed them according to the provisions of that country, and then for some reason finds that he can not export them, he will be permitted by a special contract to sell them to retailers in domestic consumption. And then I presume that there would necessarily have to be something to show that the retailer was in lawful possession of them, so that he would have the right to resell them without violating any law. And I presume that is what it means. If it does not, it does not mean anything. For the reason stated, in order to prevent the duplication, unless the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] or some other gentleman can give me some good reason why another organization should be built up in another department, employing the Lord only knows how many agents for this enforcement, going out over the country and duplicating work, I shall insist upon my amendment.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I am inclined to agree with what the gentleman says. The Agricultural Department has the administrative feature very well organized, while the Bureau of Standards is more of a research institution. There is no particular research demanded here, is there, and no technical knowledge?

Mr. GARRETT. None whatever that I can see. It is plainly detective or investigating work, just exactly like that which the Department of Agriculture is carrying on every day in the enforcement of the pure-food act and other similar laws.

Mr. FESS. It strikes me the gentleman's suggestion is a good one, and unless there is reason why it should not be voted down it should be voted up.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I do that for the purpose of making an announcement. The State Department and the Associated Press have received a telegram to the effect that Consular Officer Jenkins was released on the order of the court last night at 10 o'clock and immediately went to his home. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it seems to me from the discussion that has been had upon this bill, that the proponents of the measure have failed absolutely to show any convincing reasons why this bill should be enacted at the present time.

There is an absolute lack of any evidence to show that there is any general demand on the part of the people of this country, who will be in large measure affected by the drastic provisions of the propositions contained in this bill; but, on the other hand, it is practically admitted that the bill itself has been initiated and sponsored and drafted in a large measure by the large milling interests of this country.

Gentlemen, I want to say to you that I believe if there is anything that the people of this country as a whole are sick and tired of it is a continuance of these stringent governmental regulations in the private business affairs of the people of this country. During the operation of the war measures extraordinary powers were conferred on the centralized Government here in Washington, and the people bore a great many of those things wth patience because they recognized them as necessary. But here, under a program of reconstruction, gentlemen, there is deliberately brought in for permanent use in this country a series of regulations that violate absolutely, in my judgment, not only the provisions of the Constitution but violate any existing necessity for the passage of this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I think that is all I have to say on the proposition. There has been enough discussion here to show the absence of any necessity for this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming desire to speak in opposition to the proposition?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, it is very easy to find fault with a bill like this. I do not know of anything easier or simpler. We all know that it is tremendously important to have a flour and feed products standard established. Everybody knows that. A barrel of flour does not mean the same thing in the various States in the Union. The people of the country are being constantly imposed upon because there is no standard, and every profiteer and every dishonest dealer in the country can impose upon those to whom he sells goods. Everybody is agreed that this is an intolerable condition. We set about to establish standards of one kind and another years ago. We have advanced along that line until now we have reached this bill and the matters it refers to, and as I recollect it no one appeared in the committee against the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentlemen who fear that somewhere sometime some housewife may have some difficulty because she loans to a neighbor a cupful of flour, or some country grocery man sells a pound or two, are willing to sacrifice the whole matter of standards out of that fear, which reminds one of the ancient maiden lady who was found in a flood of tears, explained by the fact that it had just occurred to her that she might have been married in her early years, and, having been married happily, she might have had a child, and that some serious accident might have occurred to that child, and the thought of it drove her to tears; her fears had just about as much basis and foundation as most of the fears that have been suggested in connection with this legislation; just about as much. They are in the realm of fancy and imagination and improbability.

And yet gentlemen have conjured up these fears, and having brought themselves to believe that there is some basis for them they are willing to have the present unsatisfactory condition continued, under which the people of the country can be cheated, and cheated continuously, by dishonest dealers, because there is no standard established for products of this kind.

Now, if gentlemen want to go before the country defending the defeat of legislation that is intended to compel honest dealing, well and good. That is all there is in a situation of this kind. Shall we or shall we not know what constitutes a barrel of flour or a sack of flour in America? We never have known nationally; it is about time we should know, and this bill attempts to make provision for it. If the bill is not in entirely proper form, let us put it in proper form. We have been discussing and amending it for two days with that object in view.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. And gentlemen have very little faith in their amendments if, after having amended it numerous times, they now think it is unsatisfactory.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. After this bill is passed, will the gentleman from Wyoming kindly tell the committee what will constitute a barrel of flour under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. It provides for various standard packages.

Mr. BLANTON. Then we will have a barrel of flour in half a dozen different packages.

Mr. KNUTSON. What is the difference, as long as it weighs the same?

Mr. BLANTON. But, unhappily, nowhere does the bill provide what constitutes a barrel of flour.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, if the gentleman wants just exactly that provision in the bill, why does he not offer a provision stating what a barrel of flour shall weigh? It is not necessary in the establishment of a standard to do that.

Mr. BLANTON. If it were amended in any other particular, the committee would not know its own child. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. That may all be.

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not know that any committee could bring in a bill that would meet with the supreme wisdom of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; I have been associating with the gentleman from Minnesota lately. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; and if the gentleman will associate a little longer, he will get a little wisdom. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order against the motion to strike out the enacting clause, that it is not in order under the rule; and I wish to cite——

Mr. WINGO. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman is too late. The motion to strike out the enacting clause is an amendment.

Mr. SINNOTT. No; I am not too late.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Oregon cite his authority?

Mr. SINNOTT. I wish to cite to the Chairman section 3215 of Hinds' Precedents, volume 4:

> A special order providing that a bill should be open to amendments in Committee of the Whole was held to prevent a motion to strike out the enacting clause. * * *
> After debate the Chairman held:
> The Chair would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the reading of the special order under which we are operating. The Chair will hold that under the provisions of the special rule under which the committee is now operating the motion of the gentleman is not now in order.

This rule provides for the consideration of this bill, and the motion to strike out the enacting clause would now set aside the rule adopted by the House to consider the bill. The rule provides that at the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule, and thereupon the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, if any, that have been agreed upon.

This motion to strike out the enacting clause, especially before the bill has been fully read, is surely not in order, because it sets aside the special order adopted by the House for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. WALSH. What is to prevent the committee rising and reporting to the House that the bill has been amended by striking out the enacting clause?

Mr. SINNOTT. This motion has been made before the bill has been read.

Mr. WALSH. It is being read under the five-minute rule, and under the five-minute rule a motion to strike out the enacting clause is in order after the first section has been read.

Mr. SINNOTT. The rule provides that the bill shall be read; that is, that it shall be read through.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. There is one point of order pending now.

Mr. WINGO. I make the point of order that the point of order comes too late. The point of order might have been good if raised at the proper time, but there has been debate upon the amendment to strike out the enacting clause. Now, the House can waive a point of order. The Chair is familiar with that rule. The point of order should have been made the very moment the motion to strike out the enacting clause was made. Debate has intervened, and there is absolutely no question that this point of order comes too late. I make the point of order that it does.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas just stated, as I understood him, that the point of order made by the gentleman from Oregon would have been good if made in time.

Mr. WINGO. I am inclined to think, at first blush, it might have been if it had been made at the time the motion was offered, though I am not sure at the moment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The point of order goes to the authority of the committee.

Mr. WINGO. Is not that true on every amendment?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the rule forbids the committee considering a motion to strike out the enacting clause before it finishes the reading of the bill, then the point of order does not come too late, and it would be the duty of the Chair, without any regard to the point of order, if his attention was directed to it, to declare the committee to be without the power to do a thing which the House had ordered should not be done.

Mr. WINGO. What the gentleman says is true, and it is also true that the rules of the House forbid an amendment which is not germane; but if the House sits by and permits an amendment to be offered that is outlawed by the rules and permits debate, then the rules of the House say that the House is estopped from raising the point of order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The House did not sit by. The House is not here. This is the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WINGO. Well, the Committee of the Whole. Let me give the gentleman an illustration. Suppose when we are in Committee of the Whole an amendment is offered which is not germane. Under the rules of the House we are limited to the consideration of matters germane to the bill under consideration; but if the committee permits an amendment to be offered that is not germane, an amendment that is contrary to the rules, and no point of order is raised, then after debate has intervened it is estopped from raising the point of order. That is the rule of the committee itself.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is true, and that is the common practice of the House, but it is not this case at all.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, this is an effort in the Committee of the Whole to set aside a special order of the House. The Committee of the Whole has no jurisdiction to do that.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know the form of the rule or the character of the bill which was involved in the case that has been cited by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

Mr. SINNOTT. It is very much like the special order in question. Here is the rule under which the House was acting at the time that decision was made:

> * * * That general debate shall continue on said bill during each day until 5 o'clock p. m., and at evening sessions, to which a recess shall be taken, to be held from 8 o'clock till 11 o'clock p. m., until and including Thursday, the 25th day of March, unless sooner concluded; that from the conclusion of general debate until the 31st day of March there shall be debate upon the said bill by paragraphs, and during this time the bill shall be open to amendment as each paragraph is read, but committee amendments to any part of the bill shall be in order at any time.

There is very little difference.

Mr. GARRETT. I think there is a very great distinction between that resolution and the resolution under which the committee is now proceeding. That resolution fixed a definite time during which the bill was to be considered. It fixed a particular day. The distinction between that and this case is that this fixes no time limit. Unless I am very much in error in my recollection, it has been uniformly held that any bill which comes up under the general rule of the House on the Union Calendar and is considered in the House in Committee of the Whole may be amended by striking out the enacting clause in committee at any time during the progress of the bill. That is under the general rules of the House where it comes up for consideration under those general rules. Take an appropriation bill. It would be in order at any time during the consideration of an appropriation bill to move in Committee of the Whole to strike out the enacting clause. This special resolution under which this bill is being considered does not fix any time limit, does not provide that the consideration shall conclude at any particular time, but it provides that the bill shall be considered under the five-minute rule. What five-minute rule? Why, the five-minute rule prescribed by the general rules of the House. Therefore the fact that this is being considered under a special order, that special order being worded as it is, does not change its status from that of a bill privileged under the general rules of the House. And while I shall vote against the motion to strike out the enacting clause, I respectfully submit that the motion offered by the gentleman from Alabama is in order.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, while I recognize the plausible character of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I submit that the suggestion is merely plausible and nothing more. It is perfectly true that a question of authority is presented, but all things proposed to be done that are contrary to the rules present a question of authority. Permit me to illustrate. Section 776 of our House Manual provides that no motion, or proposition on any subject different from that under consideration shall be permitted under cover or guise of amendment. Suppose a bill relating to fisheries is before the House, and some Member offers an amendment that effects a radical reorganization of the Army, or Navy.

This amendment is plainly open to the objection that its consideration is contrary to the rules and in excess of the authority of the House. A question of authority is therefore presented, if objection is made in time. But if debate is allowed to proceed, the point of order will not be entertained thereafter. When such an amendment is offered, an opportunity is afforded to make the point of order, but if no one rises to make the point, and debate proceeds, the time has passed in which the point of order can be made, and thereafter the Members are estopped from raising the point of order, or if it is raised from having it considered by the Chair. That is this situation. An amendment was offered under the five-minute rule and discussed as an amendment for fully five minutes. The proponent of the amendment thereupon took his seat. Another Member was then heard in opposition for five minutes. At the conclusion of the debate the question of order that the amendment was not in order under the special rule was raised for the first time. I submit that the gentleman from Oregon was estopped from making the point of order at the time he raised it, in other words, the gentleman had slept on his rights.

The question of authority presented, if raised in time, might have sustained the point of order, just as a point of order to a non-germane amendment is good, if raised in time. The Chair can not now entertain a point of order which should have been made at the time prescribed by our rules and precedents. The gentleman has lost his day in court.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question. Suppose somebody in Committee of the Whole made a motion to lay the bill on the table, a motion which is clearly out of order, and nobody made a point of order against it, and it was voted to lay it on the table. Would the gentleman claim that that could be reported to the House?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman from Massachusetts has presented a proposition to which I can not agree. I am aware that it is commonly said that it is not in order to lay a matter on the table in Committee of the Whole, but conceding that the motion is made, and the bill without objection is laid on the table, then that is the end of the matter in the committee, unless a motion to reconsider can be made. Any question thereafter must be raised in the House. Now if in the Committee of the Whole we do something contrary to the instructions of the House, then any question over that action, if it can be raised at all, must be raised in the House.

Mr. WALSH. Suppose a member of the committee should now get up and make a motion to adjourn. Nobody raises the point of order and the motion is carried. Would the gentleman state, then, that the House had adjourned?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. No, the House would not have adjourned, but if the committee votes to adjourn and actually rises, that session of the committee would certainly be terminated. The gentleman's questions are interesting, but the situations presented by him are not analogous to the pending situation, which is one of an amendment that may, or may not be subject to a point of order, but as to which no question of order was presented until debate on the merits had been concluded.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, we are not entirely without a precedent in this matter. On June 11, 1902, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was considering under a special rule of the House a bill providing for the construction of a telegraph or cable line between the United States and the Philippine Islands. The gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Adamson, at one time in debate moved to strike out the enacting clause. I made the point of order that the special order under which the bill was considered provided for the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule, and that therefore the motion to strike out the enacting clause might in effect be the means of abrogating that provision of the order—the precise question that is raised here now. But before I made the point of order debate had begun on the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The Chairman, Mr. Lacey, of Iowa, one of the best chairmen that the House ever had in parliamentary matters, held:

Without deciding the question as to whether under the special rule under which we are proceeding, objection would have been in order if it had been made in time, the Chair is of opinion that the point of order not having been made, it is now too late to make it, just the same as in case of the rule forbidding legislation on an appropriation bill, if the point is not made when such amendment is offered, or until after debate, it comes too late. The Chair therefore holds that the point of order is not well taken.

I probably did not fully agree with the ruling of the Chair at the time. But, after all, that is the ruling of the House. Personally I am inclined to think that under the rule adopted by the House the motion to strike out the enacting clause is in order at any time, because it is a question which can be made under the rules of the House when the bill is being considered under the five-minute rule. I believe in giving the Committee of the Whole the widest latitude that is possible under the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The question raised here is rather involved, but the Chair has consulted several authorities referred to in the debate and feels clear on the point involved. The gentleman from Oregon properly refers to the paragraph 3215 of Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, in support of his contention. It seems to the Chair that in the decision rendered, referred to in that paragraph, the whole matter hinged on whether or not the point of order was made before debate had begun. We must concede in the point of order now before the committee that debate had taken place before the point of order was made. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] had made his motion to strike out the enacting clause and had debated it for a number of minutes. Therefore, as debate had taken place, in the Chair's opinion the citation of paragraph 3215 does not parallel the question now under discussion, because debate had already been had, while in that reference the decision was based on the fact that debate had not taken place previous to the point of order being made.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming had also discussed it for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. It makes no difference how many people discussed it; if it was discussed at all, that is sufficient. The Chair now refers to volume 5, Hinds' Precedents, section 6902, which was referred to a moment ago by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and the Chair had this ruling in mind before the gentleman from Illinois called his attention to it. It seems to the Chair that this case is almost a parallel case to the one now presented to the committee. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has quoted it in full, the Chair will not repeat the ruling rendered at that time, a ruling on which he founds his own ruling, but will insert it as part of his decision, as the reason why he is going to overrule the point of order. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT], on the ground that the point comes too late.

Section 6902, volume 5, Hinds' Precedents:

A point of order against the motion to strike out the enacting clause must be made before debate has begun.

On June 11, 1902, the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was considering the bill to authorize the construction, etc., of telegraphic cables, etc., when, the reading of the bill for amendment having begun, Mr. Adamson, of Georgia, moved to strike out the enacting clause. Debate having begun on his motion, Mr. MANN of Illinois made the point of order—

And so forth.

In deciding the point the Chairman said:

Without deciding the question as to whether, under the special rule under which we are proceeding, objection would have been in order if it had been made in time, the Chair is of opinion that the point of order, not having been made, it is now too late to make it, just the same as in the case of the rule forbidding legislation on an appropriation bill, if the point is not made when such an amendment is offered, or until after debate, it comes too late. The Chair therefore holds that the point of order is not well taken.

The question now is on the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BANKHEAD) there were—ayes 19, noes 95.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: Page 3, line 6, after the word "intended," insert the words "for sale within the State where packed or."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, this brings up again the question of whether this shall be a regulation of interstate commerce or a regulation of all of the details of milling within every State, regardless of whether the goods shall go in interstate commerce or not. It is only justified when it is frankly admitted that it is for the purpose of regulating all packages, whether they go into interstate commerce or not, under the right provided in the Constitution to fix the standard of weights and measures.

I contend that it is not a bill to fix the standard of weights and measures, but it is a bill to standardize the packages in which these products shall be sold. The first provision is that the standard of weights shall be 100 pounds avoirdupois. That looks like the regulation of the standard of weights, and if you would stop there you might be fixing a standard weight for a package of flour at 100 pounds, but you go on to say that you can not sell it unless you sell it in a standard-weight package or in four or five other sized packages. You have five or six standards or you have none, if you are fixing a standard size or weight, and therefore you are simply regulating the size of the package. You are not regulating the number of ounces in a pound nor the number of pounds in a ton nor the number of pounds even in a sack. You allow seven or eight different sized packages, and it is not a regulation of the standard of weights or measures. As I said a while ago, you can fix at 128 the number of cubic feet in a cord of wood, but do you think you could fix the number of feet in a load that a man would be allowed to sell? Would that be fixing a standard of measure or regulating the amount sold?

I bring this matter up. The committee has already voted upon it once in another form, but it seems to me that it ought to be included, so that we can protect the people of any State from the importation in interstate commerce of dishonest packages, just as you fix an apple barrel at so many cubic feet, but when you come to regulating packages that are put up in local mills to sell to local people you are simply regulating that which the State itself should regulate in order to protect its own citizens, and if it does not protect its own citizens, I contend that the Congress has not been given that right to protect them in this matter.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WELLING: Page 3, line 4, strike out "and" and insert "or"; line 5, after the word "grits," strike out "and" and insert "or"; line 5, strike out "and all" and insert "or any"; line 9, strike out "and" and insert "or"; line 10, after the word "grits," strike out "and" and insert "or"; line 10, strike out "and all" and insert "or any"; line 15, strike out "and" and insert "or"; line 16, strike out the first word "and" and insert "or"; line 16, strike out "and all" and insert "or any."

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That rules and regulations necessary for the enforcement of this act, not inconsistent with the provisions hereof, shall be made by the Director of the Bureau of Standards and approved by the Secretary of Commerce, and that said rules and regulations shall include reasonable variations or tolerances which may be allowed.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARRETT: Page 3, line 24, strike out the words "Director of the Bureau of Standards and approved by the Secretary of Commerce and that," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The Secretary of Agriculture and."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by myself to section 4 and adopted by the committee renders necessary the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I accept that amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I admire very much and respect both the ability and high character of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and I was very much surprised to see him come in here and criticize those of us who called attention to defects in the bill. His own speech shows that he has not read the bill. He made the most remarkable statement. He said that nobody knew before this bill was brought in what constituted a barrel of flour, how many pounds. In 31 States of the Union the schoolboys have been taught all my years that 196 pounds constituted a barrel. He says that this bill will fix a standard for barrels. I will ask the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] now, What does this bill provide shall be the standard barrel of flour—how many pounds?

Mr. MONDELL. Before the gentleman asks the question, will he be good enough to quote me correctly. I said nothing about its fixing the standard——

Mr. WINGO. What did the gentleman state, if I did not quote him correctly? Did not the gentleman state that we did not know before what constituted a barrel of flour, or what did the gentleman say?

Mr. MONDELL. I said there was a great deal of question of what constitutes a barrel of flour in America, and that is true. There is no such thing as a standard.

Mr. WINGO. Did not the gentleman say that before this bill was brought in we did not know how many pounds constituted——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is much more interested in quibbles than in securing a standard for flour and feedstuffs.

Mr. WINGO. I decline to yield for a lecture.

Mr. MONDELL. I am interested in getting a standard.

Mr. WINGO. I decline to yield to a man who knows confessedly nothing about the bill under consideration. I will eat the bill if the gentleman can point to a single line that specifies a standard for a barrel of flour.

It is not in here, and if the gentleman had read the bill he would have known it. That is the trouble with the gentlemen who assume that they have all the sum total of human intelligence, that they can sit in their offices while others of us are on the floor protecting the public welfare, and they come in occasionally and read a lecture like a school professor to naughty boys. That is the trouble. If the gentleman had read the bill, he would have seen that when he stated that we changed the standard from 196 pounds to 200 pounds that the bill does not do that. I will eat the bill if any man can show wherein this bill fixes a standard for the barrel. If you will undertake to do that, I will join you, because there is a difference in the States in regard to a barrel of flour. Thirty-one States recognize 196 pounds; others are accustomed to 200 pounds. But you do not do that. That is not what you are trying to do in this bill, and the gentleman could serve a more useful purpose if he would be here listening to attempts made by capable, serious men upon his side, as old and experienced as he is, who have made serious efforts to try to correct this foolish, slipshod legislative freak brought in here under a special rule by the Republican Party as a great reconstruction war measure, I presume. Let the gentleman study legislation before he undertakes to lecture those who stay upon the floor and try to assist in framing legislation. If you bring in a bill for a standard barrel of flour, I will help you, for we have constitutional authority for that, but I would not vote for a miserable makeshift that imposes a $500 penalty on a Wyoming housewife who packs in a package not of the size prescribed by this bill homemade hominy to send to her home town for sale, and neither will the gentleman when he reads the bill, which I hope he will when he goes to vote for it.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. GARRETT. The committee accepted the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That it shall be the duty of each district attorney to whom satisfactory evidence of any violation of this act is presented to cause proper proceedings to be instituted and prosecuted in a United States court having jurisdiction of such offense.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of suggesting to the chairman of the committee the propriety of inserting the words "United States district attorney" after the word "each," in line 4, because in some States they have a State attorney. I do not know that it appeals to the gentleman as necessary.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. As a friend of the measure I want to see it perfected as much as possible, but I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama and also the chairman of the committee if they do not think the elimination of section 6 entirely would be the proper thing to do, inasmuch as obviously under the present law it is the duty of the district attorney to enforce all the laws of the United States, and it is also the duty of the district attorneys to enforce them in different courts; and if section 6 were eliminated entirely would not the present law take care of the situation? I ask it as a friend of the bill, because I am for the bill and am voting for it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Having the floor, in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas, I will say that the suggestion meets my cordial approval, but it seems to me that the section is unnecessary in the bill. It is always the duty of the district attorneys to take cognizance of all violations of the law.

Mr. WINGO. If section 6 is out, the district attorney would have to ask for instructions of the Department of Justice, but if section 6 stays in the Attorney General would not have any control over these prosecutions as he has now under the general statute. I think it would be better to strike section 6 out and modify this law so as to be enforced under the general supervision of the Department of Justice, as all other criminal statutes are and as the present food law is enforced.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, in order to get it before the committee, I move to strike out section 6. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama withdraws the pro forma amendment and offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 4, lines 4 to 8, inclusive, strike out all of section 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That this act shall not be construed as repealing the act of July 28, 1866, chapter 301, Revised Statutes United States, sections 3569 and 3570, authorizing the use of the metric system, but such sections shall not be construed as allowing the packing, shipment, or offering for shipment, sale or offering for sale of packages of any sizes other than those established as standards herein.

Mr. BENSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to vote for this bill, and would do so if certain amendments had been passed that would bring it under the interstate commerce law; but being thoroughly convinced that there is no fixing of the standard either of weights or measures under this law, and that the passage of this law is nothing but a pretense and will bring about litigation, possibly carrying it to the Supreme Court, and when it goes there that it will be declared to be unconstitutional, and believing that the bill as a whole is one that will simply tend to interfere with business, I shall vote against it. It will put additional burdens upon the people, and will be a waste of the time of the court, and a great hindrance in every way to business generally.

I believe it will interfere largely with the small millers throughout the United States, where there is no occasion or necessity for having packages that are stamped with a certain amount of weight on them, because those millers grind for the local trade, grind by the pound, and the farmers who buy of them have intelligence enough to know what 25 pounds or 50 pounds are. I would like to vote for the bill, and would do so if the amendment suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] had been passed, and which would have put this bill under the interstate-commerce law, and not using the pretense of putting it under the provisions of the Constitution that provide for fixing the standard of weights and measures, which I do not believe this bill does.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland withdraws the pro forma amendment, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That this act, in so far as it affects the following corn-mill products, namely, corn flour, hominy, grits, and meals, shall be in force and effect 90 days from and after its passage and approval, and with respect to the other commodities affected shall be in force and effect one year from and after the passage and approval of this act.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VESTAL: Page 4, line 16, after the word "act," strike out the remainder of the section and insert in lieu thereof the following: "shall be in force and effect one year from and after the passage of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BLANTON. As a pro forma amendment, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. I just wanted to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the effect of the amendment which he has just had adopted to this bill, which, as I understood it through the noise and commotion, was to strike out the last clause allowing one year before this act would go into effect respecting flour and wheat products. Under the terms of the bill, now that said last clause is eliminated, every single flour sack in existence at the time that this bill is approved and becomes a law will be absolutely wasted and thrown away. Under the provisions of section 8 a whole year was given in which to dispose of the flour sacks now in existence. Right to-day, as I have already taken occasion to call to your attention, there are in existence enough containers in the way of flour sacks already manufactured, and in the process of manufacture, and already stamped, with the special mill stamp of each particular mill upon them, to take care of the present wheat crop in this country, and under the terms of this bill now, since this last clause has been stricken out, not a single sack or container can be used after this law goes into effect and is approved.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I do.

Mr. TILSON. Is not the gentleman laboring under a misapprehension as to what this amendment means? As I caught the meaning of it, it extends the one-year privilege to the corn-mill products and feed products as well as flour products.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no. I did not so understand it.

Mr. TILSON. It gives one year for all the products.

Mr. BLANTON. Did it not strike out the last clause?

Mr. TILSON. No. It struck out the three-months provision.

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to it. I did note that the gentleman from Utah [Mr. WELLING], who is not a lawyer, but who is a very close observer, offered an amendment here a while ago which contained 14 different vital changes to one page of this bill, and if each and every one of those amendments had not been adopted—and every one of them was a necessary life-giving amendment to this bill—without their being adopted the bill would have been farcical, and there have been so many amendments offered and so many amendments accepted by the committee, and offered and accepted in such quick succession, that I was not able to keep up with them. [Laughter.] That being the case, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment, but since the gentleman from Minnesota is now attempting as usual to butt into this debate, I am glad on behalf of his absent colleagues to see the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] back in the House again, because when we have been voting on these various amendments to-day this active, efficient Republican whip has been able to corral his colleagues in here out of the cloakroom and have them vote at the crucial time when they did not know what on God's earth they were voting for. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas withdraws his amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 10 minutes on a matter of appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes on a matter of appropriations. Is there objection?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, why can not that be done in the House? Let us dispose of this matter in the committee first. Let us dispose of the bill, and then let the gentleman from Iowa have the 10 minutes. I say we had better have it in the House. I will object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia object?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HICKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9755) to establish the standard of weights and measures for the following wheat-mill and corn-mill products, namely, flours, hominy, grits, and meals, and all commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS], Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reports that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 9755, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. By the rule——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. On such an important question I think we ought to have a quorum from now on. I think before further consideration of such an important measure as this we ought to have a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that there is no quorum present. In the opinion of the Chair a quorum is not present. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL] wish to move a call of the House?

Mr. VESTAL. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and sixty-six Members have answered to their names, and a quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY NEXT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns this evening it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WHEAT AND CORN MILL PRODUCTS.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that by unanimous consent the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] may make his statement now?

Mr. GOOD. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes on a matter of appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. GOOD. On the subject of an appropriation.

Mr. CALDWELL. Is it partisan?

Mr. GOOD. On the subject of a report with regard to an appropriation that it has been stated Congress failed to make.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, this morning's press carried the following statement:

> The Government will not attempt to control the distribution and sale of sugar after the Sugar Equalization Board is dissolved December 31.
> Attorney General Palmer in making this announcement yesterday said that as no funds had been provided by Congress for carrying on the work of handling sugar, the Department of Justice would confine its efforts to the punishment of profiteers.
> In explaining the abandonment of the program for defeating the sugar shortage, Mr. Palmer said he had put the proposition up to Congress and funds were not forthcoming.
> While Mr. Palmer's action was generally accepted as opening up the sources of more sugar supplies by permitting refiners to pay more for the Cuban raw stock, it also was believed to mean sugar prices would soar. The department will continue to hunt down profiteers, but without means of checking up on the cost to the refiner or without control of the price at which the supplies come into this country, it was believed domestic consumers would be forced to pay high prices after January 1.

Mr. Speaker, one of three things is certain. Either the newspaper reporter who wrote that article misrepresented the Attorney General, or the Attorney General spoke without knowledge, or he willfully misrepresented the action of Congress.

No appropriation has been asked for by the Attorney General for carrying on this work. When he appeared before the Committee on Appropriations in June, when the sundry civil bill was under consideration, he said:

> I should like to be heard on three matters. One is the matter of the fees of clerks. Another is the increase of appropriations for attorneys from $125,000 to $300,000, which I believe is carried in the bill as reported to the House in the last Congress, and the third is a supplemental estimate which we have submitted for an additional appropriation for the detection of crime.

Again, when he submitted his estimates for the deficiency bill the latter part of August he asked for the following sums and Congress appropriated the amounts, which I shall indicate. He asked for clerical and subclerical employees, $16,000, and Congress gave him $12,000. He asked for an increase of pay for the chief clerk of $833.34, and Congress refused to give it. He asked for an increase in salary of his private secretary of $833.34, and Congress refused to give that. He asked for an increase in the contingent expenses of $28,000, and Congress gave him $17,000. He asked for enforcement of the antitrust laws $200,000, and Congress gave it to him. He asked for transportation of aliens $250,000, and Congress gave him $200,000. He asked for the detection and prosecution of crime $1,000,000, and when explaining that estimate he said he expected to secure the punishment of profiteers and to establish fair prices of necessaries, and Congress gave him every penny that he asked for for that purpose. [Applause on the Republican side.]

He asked for $100,000 to repair the penitentiary at Fort Leavenworth injured by fire, and Congress gave him $100,000. He asked for $60,000 for equipment at Atlanta Penitentiary, and Congress gave him $50,000. He asked for United States court marshals and deputies $245,000, and Congress gave him $245,000. He asked for the district attorneys $35,000, and Congress gave him $35,000. He asked for clerical expenses in the office $150,000, and Congress gave him $150,000. He asked for special assistants to the Attorney General $345,000, and Congress gave him $325,000. He asked for miscellaneous expenses $15,000, and Congress gave him $15,000. He asked for guards at Fort Leavenworth Penitentiary $10,875, and Congress gave him the amount. He asked for the salary and maintenance $272,000, and Congress gave him that amount. He asked for the McNeill Penitentiary salary and clothing $2,234.99, and Congress gave him to the penny all that he asked.

The Attorney General asked for no further or additional appropriation in that bill.

Congress did cut estimates in the deficiency bill, but not in the estimates made by the Department of Justice, except as I have stated. We gave the Attorney General every dollar he asked for for the enforcement of laws and the punishment of profiteers.

I want to say to the membership of the House that we are living in rather peculiar times, when conditions of men's minds are unsettled, when there is great unrest, and it ill becomes a member of the executive branch to criticize the legislative branch when he bases his criticism on a misstatement of facts. It ill becomes a great Attorney General of the United States intrusted with the enforcement of the criminal laws of the United States, to go before the country misrepresenting Congress and saying that Congress declined to give him money, when Congress gave him every penny that he asked for for the enforcement of law. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I believe the Food Administration has been turned over to the Department of Justice. Does not the gentleman think it is fair to the Attorney General to state that in the last sundry civil bill Congress did either decline to appropriate money or continue money which had been appropriated for the Food Administration, and that evidently the Attorney General in his statement was referring to that and not to any specific recommendation that he made, but rather to the failure of the Congress to furnish money for the Food Administration? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman that question occurred to me; that was the reason I read from the hearings on the sundry civil bill that failed. The Attorney General was asked to make a statement in support of the estimates, and while the last Congress did not carry any provision for the very obvious reason that no estimate was made for that purpose by the Attorney General, and at the subsequent hearing it was seen that he never asked for a penny for such purpose. The only thing he wanted in addition to the appropriations carried in the sundry civil bill were the three things that I have enumerated, and none of them had the remotest relation to the question involved.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In order to be entirely fair, at the time the Attorney General appeared before the committee in the hearings last June, I take it that neither the Attorney General nor anyone else expected that the Department of Justice would ever be called upon to perform any duty in reference to the price of sugar. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Attorney General at that time was asking only for appropriations necessary for the ordinary and customary duties of the Department of Justice, without any reference to the enforcement of the food law.

Mr. GOOD. But the Attorney General came before the Committee on Appropriations when the deficiency appropriation bill was under consideration and asked for $1,000,000, and at that time he said that the United States was divided into 82 judicial districts, and that in every district he would have his fair-price committee and through that fair-price committee he intended to enforce fair prices of all of the necessaries of life, and we gave him every penny that he asked for.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Even at that time the gentleman knows that it was not anticipated by the Attorney General that he would have anything in particular to do concerning the price of sugar. He was asking for certain specific appropriations for the enforcement of the war prohibition law and also against profiteering.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, yes; he was asking for that, but he was asking for the other thing, and in his statement in the clipping from which I read, if the gentleman will follow his language, he is quoted as saying:

> In explaining the abandonment of the program for defeating the sugar shortage, Mr. Palmer said he had put the proposition up to Congress, but funds were not forthcoming.

The Attorney General never put the matter up to Congress, and Congress has never denied the request, for no request was ever made. It is unqualifiedly untrue. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Attorney General and also the President of the United States, on August 8, put the matter up to Congress, and it was more than three months before they got an appropriation to enforce the food-control law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOOD. Oh, yes; and we gave them the appropriation, and the Attorney General has also been complaining through the press of our failure to appropriate money so that he could deport the reds abroad, and yet we gave him $200,000 out of $250,000 asked for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I was out of the Chamber a part of the time when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] was speaking. Therefore I do not know whether he said to the House that he had or had not inquired of the Attorney General if he had made this statement. While the newspaper clipping the gentleman read from does not disclose the name of the newspaper, I take it for granted that it is a clipping from the Washington Post, and therefore I know that it can not be relied upon to state the truth. [Applause.] I am glad to see that some of my friends on the Republican side of the House also applaud that statement. It shows that at last they are realizing where the truth can and can not be expected.

Knowing that the Attorney General had not made any such statement, I telephoned to him, and he read to me the statement that he gave to the press, and nowhere in that statement did the Attorney General say that he had asked Congress for any funds for that purpose. He did say that he had called the attention of the Congress to the necessity of extending the powers of the Sugar Equalization Board after December 30, when those powers expire. Before the Senate Agriculture Committee he made a plea for the extension of the powers of that board. That extension has not been granted, and neither the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] nor any other Member of Congress will assert that the Attorney General has any powers other than those he states he possesses in this statement published this morning.

Not having those powers, he made the statement to the country that he had asked the Congress for that extension. He did not say that he had asked the Appropriations Committee for it. His statement is in writing, and if the gentleman from Iowa had been fair enough and square enough to ask the Attorney General if he had been correctly quoted in the Post he would never have made the statement that he has just made on the floor of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman that the Evening Star carries practically the same article that was carried in the Washington Post of this morning.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Why, my good friend, I have a great deal of respect for the Star, but that does not change the fact that the Attorney General has a copy of the statement that he made, in writing, on his desk, and has just read it to me. Nowhere in that statement did he say that he had ever asked the Committee on Appropriations for funds, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations could have ascertained that if he had done the Attorney General the justice of asking if he was correctly quoted before coming here and denouncing him.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. First, I ask permission, before I forget, to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting the statement of the Attorney General, so that the House and the country can see exactly what it was.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the gentleman a certified copy of the Attorney General's statement?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No. Whenever I get a statement from the Attorney General I do not have to have it certified. His word is good enough for me and for the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. Is his statement signed?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. When he turns over to me the statement I shall insert it in the RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object unless it is signed.

Mr. GOOD. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had already put the request and it has been granted.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think that ought to go unchallenged. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

I was asking the gentleman about the statement of the Attorney General.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not yield the floor to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The Chair put the question before the gentleman rose, of which the gentleman was doubtless unaware.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will yield.

Mr. GOOD. I want to ask the gentleman if he is willing to state to the House that the Attorney General has said to him that he did not criticize Congress for its failure to make an appropriation in the statement which he made?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In the statement which he made there is absolutely no criticism of Congress for failure to make any appropriation. The statement is simply that he had requested that the powers of the Sugar Equalization Board be extended, and that the failure of Congress to extend the powers of that board placed him in the position set forth in that statement. There is no mention of any appropriation at all. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations never would have taken offense at the statement the Attorney General authorized, which I will put in the RECORD to-morrow morning.

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman will yield further, I will say to the gentleman the Attorney General has been quoted very frequently in his criticism of Congress because of the failure to give money to deport aliens who were not desirable citizens——

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The gentleman was discussing sugar and has now switched to aliens. As I am not informed on that subject, I can not answer.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. In accordance with permission granted by the House, I insert the statement issued by the Attorney General.

The Attorney General to-day authorized the following statement:

A conference has been held this morning between representatives of the Sugar Equalization Board and the Department of Justice, in which the sugar situation was reviewed. The Department of Justice has neither the power nor the facilities with which to control the purchase or distribution of sugar. The only governmental body having this power is the Sugar Equalization Board, and its control terminates on December 31. The Congress, although requested to do so, has failed to extend the life of the board. The Department of Justice will confine its efforts in the future, as it has in the past, to the enforcement of the provisions of the Lever Food-Control Act, as amended, by prosecuting all instances of sales of sugar for an unjust or unreasonable profit.

The Department of Justice has never attempted to fix the price of sugar. It has accepted in the past the recommendations of the Sugar Equalization Board very largely in determining maximum fair prices. The fair margins of profit allowed are those established by the Food Administration. When such determinations were made they have been communicated to the district attorneys, who were advised that any sales in excess of the maximum figure set should be considered unfair and unreasonable. The early termination of the board will make it impossible to set any definite price on sugar in the future or control its distribution. Every sale will be treated on its own merits, and in all cases where the district attorney has evidence indicating an unfair profit or withholding of sugar from the normal consumptive channels, or any discrimination in price to the manufacturer or to the jobber supplying the domestic consumer, he will proceed under the Lever Food-Control Act.

The SPEAKER. The previous question was ordered on the bill H. R. 9755 by the rule. The first question is on the amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I request a reading of the engrossed copy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a reading of the engrossed copy of the bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3288) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended.

Friday, December 5, 1919.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I would not take the time of the Senate to discuss the pending bill were it not for the fact and I desire to place in the RECORD certain data which I believe will be of aid to Senators in considering this bill.

We are now facing the most tremendous economic problem ever presented to this country for solution, to a large extent incident to the direct result of the Government's operation of the railways during the last two years. When the President indicated, in December, 1917, his intention to take over, for Government operation, all the railways of the United States, many were convinced that there was no necessity for it and that it would be disastrous. The experiment has amply justified all our fears. It has cost the taxpayers of this country hundreds of millions of dollars, destroyed the efficiency of the service, and placed the railroads to-day in a position where unless some drastic steps are taken this country faces a financial crash, which will not only destroy hundreds of millions in property held by the people of the United States but destroy the efficiency of our transportation system.

Mr. President, I am aware that usually little is to be gained by the discussion of things which have already happened. But in this case these events may point us toward the proper remedy.

Mr. President, I shall try, in this address, to describe the condition of the railroads at the time they were taken over by the Government, the effect of Government operation, the present condition, and the provisions of this bill reported by the committee and designed to afford a remedy. I shall not, to any extent, discuss the subject of Government ownership and operation of the railroads, because that question has been answered in the last two years and settled by the judgment of the American people.

When the war broke out we had in this country, all in all, the best, cheapest, and the most efficient transportation system in the world. That it was not perfect goes without saying. But this is true, and will be conceded by substantially all the experts in the world, that nearly all the inventions, improvements, and advancements of transportation facilities have resulted from American incentive, genius, and energy and enterprise. An efficient and constantly growing transportation system is absolutely necessary to the very life and prosperity of this Nation and must be had to maintain the growth of the country. In the main, the present deplorable condition of the railroads is due to inefficient and extravagant Government management and stupid bureaucratic control. There was no necessity for taking over the railroads any more than there was for taking over the telegraphs, telephones, and cables, which has now been demonstrated beyond question, and which proved so expensive to the Government and disastrous to good service. The Postmaster General reports a loss to date of $14,418,237 in the operation of telephone, telegraph, and cable systems, and there are many companies with which a settlement has not yet been made. Because there was temporary congestion on account of the sudden and enormous increase of business in a comparatively small territory, the President took over all the railroads of the United States for Government operation, created a great central bureau, which, as everyone knows, always is inefficient. I do not claim that after the war broke out the transportation system of this country was sufficient to effectively take care of the sudden increase of business. But during the first nine months of the war the railroads themselves, with all the handicaps of Government interference, priority orders, and laws which prevented the coordination of their facilities, handled as great a business under more adverse conditions at a less expense than has been handled by the Railroad Administration since that time.

Nineteen hundred and seven to nineteen hundred and sixteen were generally years of depression in railroad business, and according to the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission the number of cars in the country exceeded the demand. Then came, on account of the European war, a sudden and great expansion in our railroad transportation. The freight traffic increased about 50 per cent from 1915 to 1917, or, in other words, 135,164,000,000 ton-miles, which was equal to the entire traffic of all the railroads of Canada, Germany, Great Britain, Russia, France, and Austria, excluding Hungary. Then this country declared war in April, 1917. The railroads were deprived of 12½ per cent of their efficient men, the passenger and freight traffic suddenly increased, the mobilization of millions of troops placed an additional burden on the railways, there occurred a great increase in manufacturing and transportation, especially between Chicago and New York, and it is no wonder that our transportation systems could not handle all this traffic promptly and effectively. The railroads did organize immediately under the call of the Council of National Defense, by appointing a railway executive committee, which took charge, so far as the Government would permit, of all the railroads, intending to coordinate their facilities, and did handle the transportation more effectively than it has ever been handled since. One of the difficulties was that the Government kept interfering by priority orders issued by hundreds of the Government's agencies all over the country, until it was estimated that nearly 80 per cent of the traffic on some railroads was under priority orders, which largely interfered with the management of the systems. All that it was necessary for the Government to do was to appoint an agent with authority to see that the railroads gave preference to all Government business and such business as was incidentally necessary to carrying on the war. Had this been done and the various organizations of all the railroads availed of, instead of largely being scrapped and replaced by a new organization in Washington we should not only have had more efficient transportation but we should have avoided the financial disaster which has followed this Government operation.

During the first nine months of the war, from April, 1917, to January, 1918, while the railroads were under private management, with all the Government interference, priority orders, and inability, on account of the law, to coordinate their facilities, they handled substantially as much traffic as was handled in the same nine months of 1918, and more than was handled in the same period during 1919. In the year 1917 the railroads handled substantially as much business as they did in 1918, and more than they did in 1919, with about 190,000 less employees and $1,500,000,000 less cost.

In spite of the increase of from 25 to 50 per cent in freight and passenger rates, the net earnings of the railroads have constantly decreased under Government operation, until they are now so low that the Government is losing about $350,000,000 per annum, and if the roads were turned back to private ownership without adequate provision they could not pay the interest on their bonds.

I ask leave to place in the RECORD, at the end of my remarks, as Appendix A, a statement of the ton and passenger miles of the railroads during the years 1917, 1918, and 1919, compared with the average of the three preceding years.

It will thus be seen that in the year 1917 the ton and passenger miles of the railways were almost equal to 1918, and during the nine months of war in 1917 they were nearly equal to the same nine months of war in 1918, and the business of 1917 was greater than the business of 1919, the latter two months of which are estimated.

Let us therefore consider the financial condition of the railroads when the Government took them over and the present financial condition. In 1917 the gross earnings of all class 1 railroads totaled $4,050,463,579. The total operating expenses aggregated $2,858,212,210, and the net income equaled $974,778,937, while the best information we can get for 1919 will show that the railroads will earn substantially $5,232,000,000 with less business than in 1917. This estimate may be a little large on account of depression in November. This is on account of an increase in freight and passenger rates from 25 to 50 per cent. And yet the operating expenses of the roads have increased from $2,858,212,210 to an estimated operating expense, including taxes and rentals, of $4,695,500,000, leaving an estimated net income of only $536,500,000, or nearly $400,000,000 less than the guaranteed income which was the average of the net earnings of the roads for the years 1915, 1916, and 1917. In other words, the people of the United States were paying over a billion and a half dollars more for handling less traffic in 1919 than they were in 1917, and the owners of the roads but for the Government guaranty would receive about $438,000,000 less.

The following is a statement of the operating revenues, operating expenses, taxes, and net operating income of the roads for the test period of 1915, 1916, and 1917 and for the years 1917, 1918, and 1919:

Year 1919 to Sept. 30—do	84.84
Year 1919, estimated	85.44

In 1917 the percentage of operating expenses to gross earnings of all the roads in the United States was 70.57 per cent; that is, for each dollar earned it cost 70.57 cents to operate the roads. In 1918 this had risen to 81.55 per cent, and in 1919 it is estimated at 85.44 per cent.

In 1917 all of class 1 railroads of the United States earned 5.38 per cent on their property investment. This was the last year of private operation. In 1918 they earned 3.71 per cent, and during the first six months of 1919 they earned eighty-four one-hundredths per cent—of course I am taking book values because I have no others available—but the first six months of the calendar year is, on the average, the poorest half of the year. And the first nine months they had earned 2.19 per cent, which is estimated for the year to be 2.92 per cent, or less than the interest on the bonds and fixed charges of the railroads without paying anything at all on capital stock; and it is conceded by everyone that the bonded indebtedness of the railroads is six or seven billions less than the fair value of the properties.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks as Appendix B a statement showing the names of the railroads, the miles operated, the net operating income, the fixed charges, and the balance over fixed charges for the first nine months of 1919, and also a summary of this statement by districts; and as a part of the same statement Appendix C, showing the railroads which earned a greater or less sum than the standard return.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KELLOGG. From these statements it is easy to determine the present status of the railroads, and it is perfectly evident that unless the net earnings are increased a very large percentage of the railroads, including some of the best, will be in the hands of a receiver within a few months for inability to pay their interest and fixed charges.

This statement shows that in the first nine months the railroads failed to earn their fixed charges in the sum of $56,658,204.

That means that they failed to earn their interest and those charges that are fixed, such as rentals, and so forth. But a glance at the individual railroads will show the startling condition. For instance, in the eastern district the Pennsylvania Railroad had a deficit of $10,483,413; the New York Central had a surplus of $2,371,808; the Reading had a deficit of $2,860,863; the Baltimore & Ohio suffered a deficit of $13,394,762; the Chicago & Eastern Illinois had a deficit of $4,036,202; and the Panhandle—one of the Pennsylvania lines—$2,027,823. In the southern district nearly all of the railroads had a deficit. In the western district the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul earned no interest on its bonds whatever. It had a large deficit of $11,466,252, which is, as I recollect, about the interest on its bonds. The Great Northern Railroad had a deficit of $365,240. The Northern Pacific just about earned its fixed charges and had a small surplus of $148,002. The Southern Pacific had a deficit of $13,088,404.

These tables show that 57 railroads in the United States earned $111,132,062 more than their fixed charges during these nine months, while 108 railroads earned $167,790,266 less than their fixed charges; so that practically two-thirds of the railroads of the United States must inevitably go into the hands of a receiver unless their conditions are improved—and these are not the poor railroads; they are such lines as the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore & Ohio, the Great Northern, the Southern Pacific, and many others. For immediately the railroads are turned back to their owners, unless Congress acts, the guaranteed return ceases and the railroads are dependent upon their earnings, which have been established by the Government. In other words, the operating expenses of a railroad are, of course, its first charge and must be paid before any interest on securities. The Government took over these railroads in a solvent condition, and while, of course, it has paid, during its operation, a fair rental for the properties, it has increased the operating expenses so greatly that when they are turned back they will be bankrupt and can not from their earnings pay their operating expenses and fixed charges, without one dollar for dividends. A railroad is worth what it will earn.

I do not mean that it should be capitalized on an earning basis; but if it earns nothing it is worthless; and the wages and expenses of operation, once increased, are very difficult to decrease. It is also difficult to increase rates, and it is a serious question in my mind whether rates can be raised sufficiently to make up the enormous deficit the railroads are now suffering. One thing is certain, that passenger rates can not be raised, and it is doubtful whether the rates on many of the leading staple commodities of the country can be increased, such as grain, coal, flour, meat products, and many others.

One of the questions we have been compelled to face involves the cause of this abnormal cost of operation and whether it can be reduced. The principal causes of the increase of operating expenses have been increase of wages, increase in number of employees to do the same or less work, decrease of efficiency, a large operating bureau in Washington, and increase in the cost of materials.

In the first place, when the Government took over the railroads it was supposed that the Director General would avail himself of the complete organizations of each railroad and confine his activities to such direction as was necessary to expedite Government transportation during the war. But in this the public was disappointed. Mr. McAdoo had more ambitious ideas, so he established a great central organization, with 2,600 employees in Washington and scattered over the country, which directly interfered with and benumbed the incentive and enterprise of every railroad organization. It went over the heads of local officials and was enormously expensive. It demonstrated beyond question that you can not efficiently operate 260,000 miles of railroad from a central bureau in Washington full of red tape and bureaucratic obstinance and interference.

The result met the expectations of those who were familiar with railroad operations; and not only was the public poorly served, but people living a long distance from the Capital wishing to obtain transportation facilities, changes in rates, or a hearing on questions of overcharges or damages found it impossible to break through the web of central bureaucratic control in Washington.

I am not blaming the men in charge of it. They are mostly able, conscientious workers and did their very best. I am blaming the men who created this impossible situation in order to build up the power of the Government.

Mr. McAdoo, speaking before the Interstate Commerce Committee in 1918, expressed the hope that very large economies would be practiced in railroad transportation. The fact is that not in one single department of railroad management, except possibly the legal department, which is of minor importance so far as expenses are concerned, has there been economy, but, on the contrary, enormous extravagance. It was claimed that great sums would be saved in the salaries of personnel. In fact, nothing has been saved, and at present, with less business than the railroads were doing in 1917, there were employed in July, 1919, the last month for which we have information, 190,539 more employees than in December, 1917, whose pay will average about $1,500 per annum, or $285,808,500, which is more than 4 per cent on all the capital stock of all the railroads in the United States.

Of course, as the chairman of the committee has said, quite a percentage of this increase was caused by the decrease of working hours, which I do not criticize; but if you will examine the figures, you will see it can not be accounted for altogether by the decrease in working hours, which, as I recollect, amounts only to about 4 per cent.

At the time the Government took over the roads the Director General appointed, by General Order No. 5, a wage commission, composed of Franklin K. Lane as chairman, Charles C. McChord, J. Harry Covington, and William R. Willcox. They made a thorough investigation and reported, on April 30, 1918, that the wage demands of the employees amounted to a billion dollars. They reported that there should be an increase of about $300,000,000 to meet the increased cost of living. This was a very carefully prepared and exhaustive report. This increase was put into effect, and immediately the Director General continued to increase the salaries of nearly all classes of employees, until he reached and passed the billion mark, and they are still demanding much more. It was stated this summer that the President had denied the shopmen any substantial increase and had only given them an increase of 4 cents an hour. But this amounted to $60,000,000 a year.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. For information I am rather desirous of knowing how the increase could be from zero to $1,000,000,000 when the committee which presumably had charge of the entire field recommended an increase of only $300,000,000. When were the other increases made which raised the amount $1,000,000,000 above the $300,000,000 recommended by the committee?

Mr. KELLOGG. After the first increase recommended by the board on wages and working conditions in the Railroad Administration was made they started in and have been increasing wages ever since. I am not saying that they have been increased too much; I will come to that in a moment.

I am not contending that the general average of the principal employees is too high, although the increase as a whole since 1915 is equal to the increase in the cost of living—and I will give in a moment the exact figures—but what is subject to condemnation is this: First, the Director General has standardized the wages of practically all railroad employees throughout the United States in the same class, irrespective of the cost of living and local conditions.

Second, thousands of orders have been made reclassifying employees and taking them out of a lower class and placing them in a higher class of pay.

On the first point of standardization: For instance, the pay of many employees in remote districts, on branch lines, where traffic was light, the cost of living very low, and in many cases where employees devoted to their duties only a part of their time, has been raised equal to those in more densely populated districts, under more expensive living conditions. In some instances where station agents had other employment and only devoted a part of their time to railroad business their salaries have been increased from 100 to 200 per cent. Office boys 12 or 13 years of age, studying shorthand or going to school part of the time, have been raised from $35 and $40 a month to as high as $80 and $90, and in many cases men in subordinate positions have received a higher salary than their superiors.

These inequalities have added grossly to the cost of operation of the railroads, have created unrest, and have had a bad effect upon the morale of the service. But if the public thinks that wages are not being increased almost daily they should have access to the orders made by the authorized boards on wages and working conditions in the Railroad Administration. Men are constantly being taken out of one class and placed in a higher skilled class. For instance, in one case, men engaged in cleaning Pullman cars were taken out of the ordinary day-labor class and placed in the class of expert upholsterers and their pay raised from 40 cents to 68 cents an hour, and they still continue to perform their old duties. The fact is that this is going on all over the country to-day. These orders are being made reclassifying the men so as to add enormously to the cost of operation without justice to the great class of men themselves.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD, as Appendix D to my remarks, a statement showing the annual compensation of various classes of employees and the increases in their salaries during the years 1915, 1917, and 1919. The increases in the salaries of employees during 1919, compared with the year 1915, amounted to 72.7 per cent, and as compared with the year 1917, 42.7 per cent. Of course, this does not show the inequalities, because the only information I have bears upon averages. Many men have been raised out of all proportion to their coemployees, and it is that which has created discontent and a large amount of the expense. This does not represent all of the increases now in effect, since it does not include the $60,000,000 given the shopmen in the way of increases which the Director General has put into effect since the 1st of July, 1919.

The chairman of the committee said the other day that he did not think these average wages were too high. I do not myself. For the benefit of the Senate I will state that the best information I can get, which is from the National Industrial Conference Board, Boston, Mass., shows that the cost of living, including all elements, such as food, shelter, heat, light, fuel, and sundries in July, 1919, was 73 per cent greater than in July, 1915, and 30 per cent greater than in July, 1917.

This statement, however, does not show what I consider the most unjustifiable phase of reclassification in many cases. This is general averages—the only way the information can be procured. To get this reclassification one must go through thousands of orders.

But the present deplorable financial condition of the railroads is not the only serious question confronting our transportation system. During the Government operation in the last two years the extensions, additions, and improvements in railroads, and especially in equipment, have been way below the average of previous years and below the demands of the transportation of the country. In other words, without regard to the physical condition, the Government has allowed the railroads to fall behind that normal increase necessary to the transportation of this country.

There is to-day a great shortage of cars all over the country. I doubt if there is a Senator in this Chamber who has not had demands from his constituents for cars.

In fact, there has existed during the last two years a shortage of cars, and yet the Railroad Administration has only purchased 100,000 cars in two years, which is much less than the average yearly purchases of the railroads before, and is about one-half of the deterioration or loss of cars by wearing out, destruction, and so forth.

On January 1, 1918, when the railroads were taken over, there was undoubtedly a great shortage of cars in this country. The cause was perfectly obvious. The years 1913, 1914, and 1915, especially the latter, were, as the Interstate Commerce Commission reported, years of great depreciation in railroad business, and there was a surplus of cars from 1907 to 1916. Then came the great increase of business on account of the war. What the Government should have done on January 1, 1918, was to have directed the railroads to let contracts for all the cars which the shops of the country could build. And this might have been done then at a fairly reasonable price. But what was done was to spend four or five valuable months in trying to standardize cars and locomotives, which has practically amounted to nothing. Committees of manufacturers and committees of railroad men were appointed by Mr. McAdoo and all this time wasted in a futile attempt to do something which decades of experts in railroad work could not accomplish, so that Mr. McAdoo might say that he had standardized the cars and locomotives of the country. The result was that not until May were any contracts let for cars, and during the last two years only 100,000 cars have been built, and I am not sure that all of these have been delivered, while during the years from 1899 to 1918 the average annual purchase of freight cars was 134,310.

I place in the RECORD, as Appendix H, a statement showing the average annual purchases of cars and locomotives from 1901 to 1918.

So far as permanent betterments and improvements to railroads are concerned, the administration has done better, although not all that the needs of the country demand. During the years 1912 to 1917 the railroads spent an average of $446,000,000 per annum on such betterments and improvements. As near as it can be estimated, the present administration has spent about $400,000,000 per annum, but from 1912 to 1917 a dollar would purchase much more in improvements than during the last two years, so that $400,000,000 per annum since 1918 is entirely disproportionate to the amount spent before that time and does not make up for the increased demands upon the transportation system of the country.

When the railroads are turned back to their owners with depleted earnings they are going to be confronted with car shortage due to the failure of the Government to purchase a sufficient equipment, and this car shortage must be made up if the business of the country is to be transacted. A call for cars is coming from all over the country. The Railroad Administration is doing nothing toward obtaining additional equipment, and therefore the railroads should be turned back as soon as possible, so that the companies may take steps to do so.

I have thus given a mere outline of the condition of the railroads and the difficulty confronting the Interstate Commerce Committee when it undertook to solve this problem. The committee took testimony for two months and, through its subcommittee or the whole committee, spent nearly four months in careful investigation and in drafting a bill to be presented to Congress.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry before he leaves the subject of betterments and improvements?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I have heard the charge repeatedly made that the Railroad Administration has discriminated against a large number of roads which were under its control, and that the improvements which have been made have been confined to a few roads. I shall not mention a number of roads which have been brought to my attention, but the charge is made that there has been a deliberate purpose on the part of the Railroad Administration, or some of its subordinates, to build up some roads—that is to say, to give them proper betterments and the very best of equipment—and that at the same time they have failed to maintain other roads according to the standard that they were operating under prior to the Government taking them over. Does anything in the testimony indicate that there has been any discrimination, and if there has been no discrimination does the evidence show that some of the roads have been neglected, whether purposely or because of lack of funds?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not think the testimony shows any intentional discrimination, and I have never heard any such complaint. Of course, the fact is that some roads have been maintained in better shape than other roads, which is probably due to many conditions, one of which would be the want of funds by the railroad, or earnings of the railroad for maintenance. Another might be that it was necessary that a certain road should be kept in much better condition so that the Government could transport material over that road. I know that a great deal of complaint has been made by some of the roads of discrimination in traffic, but it is inevitable that such complaints should be made, and I have no doubt that some discrimination has occurred.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the Senator another question before he leaves that subject. It may be that I ought to preface the question by saying that I have no other object in propounding any question except to get light on the subject, which I think possibly the Senator will be able to give.

In a conversation that I had with an employee of the Railroad Administration soon after the railroads were taken over he stated to me that at the time the Government took the railroads over they were in a very poor condition and that the engines and cars had not been kept up. He showed me at that time some photographs that he said were taken at various places along the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, showing a large number of engines, which appeared in the photograph to be standing out on sidetracks, that were not in condition to be used; and that the Railroad Administration, when it took the roads over, first had to do a lot of repairing. In other words, his claim was that a great many of the roads were in such a condition at the time, from overwork and from the demands that had been made on them, although he did not say that it was intentional, of course, that the property was in very bad condition and had to be repaired before it could be used. Is there anything in that?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the committee did not go into that subject. Undoubtedly there are some railroads that had not been kept up, and there are some that have not been kept up since. The best information I could get from the accountant of the Railroad Administration is that even at the present time maintenance is being what they call "scrimped." It is not what it should be to keep the railroads up to standard in some cases. But I have heard no general complaint that the railroads were in bad condition at that time and have been put in better condition since. I do not think that generally that is true.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a suggestion at this point which is somewhat in response to the inquiry made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I made some inquiries just before the Government took the railroads over, and I found that many of the railroad companies had been denied the right of acquiring engines and other equipment, and had really been denied in part the opportunity to repair some of their equipment, because the demands of the Allies were so great that it was deemed imperative that they be supplied, even though it meant denying the right of some of our own railroads to obtain the things which they required.

Mr. NORRIS. Was that before the railroads were taken over?

Mr. KING. Yes; before they were taken over by the Government. I know that a number of the railroad companies had put in orders for engines, and the engines which they had ordered were transshipped and sent across the sea; at least, that is my information. They were ready to pay for them, and they needed them very badly, but it was thought that we should accede to the demands of the allied Governments. Indeed, Russia made some very important demands, and many of the companies that were engaged in constructing engines canceled their engagements with our domestic operations in order to build engines and other equipment for the allied Governments.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, of course that was true. After the war broke out, in 1917, the railroads were unable to get the materials they needed, and a like condition handicapped the Government to a considerable extent afterwards, and it hurt both the railroads and the Government.

The committee heard the committees of the railroad executives, railroad security holders, chambers of commerce, farmers' organizations, employees' organizations, State railway commissions, and many others, and has finally submitted a bill which is the product representing the consensus of opinion of the committee, although not unanimously concurred in in all respects.

I now desire to discuss the principal features of the railroad bill:

First. Guaranty during readjustment: I think it is evident to everyone that the Government, having produced this condition of the railroads, without regard to the merits of the increase of operating expenses, incurs the duty for a reasonable time, while the rates are being readjusted, to meet operating costs and continue its guaranty. We have no right to take over a public-service corporation and use it for Government purposes, increase its operating expenses so as to render the property valueless, and turn it back without any remedy. Furthermore, should this be done, a financial collapse in this country is bound to follow, and as the bonds of these railroads are held in savings banks, insurance companies, and by millions of individuals, and are a large basis of credit, the greatest care should be taken to preserve their integrity.
